Under the previous action of Congress a board of engineers was appointed, who made a survey and estimates, and have reported upon the practicability and probable cost of the proposed improvement at this point. Their report is so full and conclusive that I prefer the board of engineers to speak to this question rather than myself, and I ask the Clerk to read what I have marked touching that matter.

The Clerk read as follows:

It may be well here to state what the board understands by the expression "national harbor of refuge of the first class." It may be defined to be an artificial harbor, prepared at the expense of the General Government, capable of affording refuge and shelter to a large number of vessels, great and small, at the same time, this refuge and shelter referring to danger from storms, actual or impending, as well as from hostile ships in time of war.

Such a harbor of refuge should be easy of entrance at all states of the wind and tide, by night as well as by day; should have sufficient depth and area at all stages of the tide; should be free from the hurtful action of strong winds and currents and of ice; should have a good holding-ground, and be readily defended from hostile ships.

Very great depth is not only not necessary, but is undesirable, as requiring vessels to have very long cables and to take more time in coming to anchor and departing, as well as more room for swinging at anchor. Room is needed in a harbor not only for vessels quietly at anchor, but for those entering in the confusion and tumult of a gale to find a place among others already within. The speed of such vessels can not be checked in a moment. Great artificial harbors of refuge, such as here described, are very few in the world, and, it may be added, very expensive to construct. The importance of such a harbor is greatly enhanced if it be at or near a great commercial center.

These being in our view the essential features of any harbor that may be properly designated "a national harbor of refuge of the first class," it may be said at once that considering the present defenseless condition of the natural harbors in which our coasts abound, and the exposure of our navy-yards and our great maritime centers of commerce to the assaults of an enemy's fleet, it is wholly useless to construct an artificial harbor anywhere if its defensibility against a foreign enemy is to be regarded as one of its requisites.

It is not to be supposed that a fleet would require a refuge from an enemy. A single ship might need such a place of retreat near Cape Ann, and this could be readily afforded by the existing harbor of Gloucester to the northwest of Boston, as it would on the south at Provincetown.

The Navy of the United States does not at this time require much space for its accommodation. If the number of ships be increased they will be steamers, and could readily be accommodated in the harbors of Boston, Portland, or Provincetown, should it be deemed best to withdraw them from the open sea.

Leaving, then, the question of defense out of consideration, we shall discuss the proposed harbor only with regard to its value as a place of refuge during storms.

Harbors of refuge are more important for sailing vessels than for steamers, as the latter are more navigable under the varying conditions of winds and currents. And this consideration is becoming of more importance every year, as the commerce of the world is more and more carried on by steam. As the steamers are more independent in movement as well as usually more quick, it would appear that a number of smaller harbors of refuge nearer together, the total cost being the same, would be more useful than one great one, as the former would be more convenient to the slower sailing vessels that happened to be caught by bad weather in their vicinity.

It must not be supposed that all wrecks would be prevented, if harbors of refuge, great and small, were numerous. Nor is it probable that such harbors would be used by all vessels, either steamers or sailers, as some, perhaps many, would prefer to go to sea rather than enter them. Insufficient crews and equipage and bad management will cause many wrecks to occur, notwithstanding the existence of natural harbors and the construction of artificial ones.

An idea of the necessity of a harbor of refuge in any special locality may be obtained by examining the record of wrecks that have occurred in its vicinity and the consequent loss of property.

Having made these general observations, let the ideas they involve be applied to the particular case under consideration, namely, the construction at Sandy Bay of "a national harbor of refuge of the first class."

The project of Major Raymond, as contained in his report of November 28, 1883, published in Senate Executive Document No. 74, Forty-eighth Congress, first session, has been examined by the board with attention and great interest. He proposes to inclose an area of 1,664 acres inside the high-water line, while on the 24-foot contour the area would be 1,377 acres.

It is estimated that 70,000 vessels pass Cape Ann annually. This would be about 6,000 each month or 200 each day. These are almost all bound to or from Boston; about half each way, or about one hundred each way each day. Vessels going from Boston would seldom need a harbor of refuge at Cape Ann, as precedence would require them to refrain from leaving a good and safe harbor to risk the dangers of Cape Ann in a storm. Heavy storms seldom continue more than three days. It would seem sufficient, therefore, to provide for one hundred vessels approaching Boston on each of the three successive days, or three hundred vessels. Allowing one and one-half acres of anchorage ground to each, we would need a harbor of but four hundred and fifty acres. One and one-half acres for each is an ample allowance.

Few of these vessels would have a draught exceeding fifteen feet. To provide, therefore, an area of five hundred acres with a depth at low water nowhere less than thirty feet would be enough. The plan of Major Raymond is estimated by him to cost $4,000,000 and to require ten years for its completion with regular annual appropriations of $400,000. It is thought by the board that the cost should be set at not less than $5,000,000, and to this should be added $500,000 for lighthouses, buoys, &c., and not less than $2,000,000 for defenses, if they are to be considered.

It is not probable, judging of the future from the past, that $400,000 are to be appropriated each year for this object. The increase in the time of construction would greatly add to the final cost of the work.

An examination of a list of wrecks between the ports of Boston and Portland during the past fifty-five years, which has been furnished to the board and is supposed to be authentic, gives the following information: The total number of wrecks in all these years has been less than 400. The vessels wrecked were almost all of small-sized schooners. The least number reported in one year, 1831, was 1, and the greatest number was 40, in 1840. The average has been 7 or 8 per annum, and of these some at least would not have been prevented by a harbor of refuge at Sandy Bay. It may not be inappropriate also to compare the average annual loss with the interest on the total cost of such a harbor of refuge as is contemplated.

In view of all the circumstances of the case, the board has reached the following conclusions:

It is not considered necessary or expedient at this time to construct "a national harbor of refuge of the first class" at any point "between Boston and Portland." Should Congress decide otherwise, the board is of the opinion that Sandy Bay "is the best place" for such a harbor between Boston and Portland. If Sandy Bay be occupied and the area of the harbor be made as great as proposed by Major Raymond the lines selected by him for the breakwater seem the best.

It is recommended that further study be given by Major Raymond to the consideration of the practicability and cost of construction of a harbor of smaller area at Sandy Bay, with a view mainly to a reduction of expense, and that in connection therewith he examine the question of constructing a smaller harbor at the southeast point of Cape Ann as well as the improvement of the harbor of Gloucester, which would be effected by a breakwater on the bar at its mouth.

Should it be decided by the authorities in Washington that a national harbor of refuge of the first class is to be made at Sandy Bay, it is considered that it would be inexpedient, with so small a sum as $100,000, to make any expenditure looking thereto except to commence the observations and studies which should precede the preparation of a detailed project for so great, difficult, and costly a work, and that actual construction should not be commenced until the engineer had in hand at least $500,000.

Second. If, as suggested by the board in their preliminary report, the idea of constructing "a national harbor of refuge of the first class" in this vicinity be abandoned on account of the useless expense which it would involve, and a smaller harbor of refuge for commercial uses only be substituted, the board are of the opinion that the interest of commerce will be best subserved by the formation of an artificial harbor at the southeast point of Cape Ann, by constructing breakwaters from Thatcher's Island to Milk Island, and from each of these islands toward the shore, with suitable entrances.

This would furnish anchorage in water from twelve to thirty-five feet deep for about one hundred and fifty vessels of the classes which would most commonly make use of it, according to the allowance of one and one-half acres for each, given in the preliminary report of the board.

The estimated cost of this harbor, according to the views of the board, is about $1,000,000, which is about one-fifth of the amount which they estimated as the cost of the proposed harbor at Sandy Bar.

The special advantages which a harbor here would offer are: First. That the site is already well known to navigators, and is well marked and lighted by the Cape Ann or Thatcher's Island lights—two conspicuous lights of the first order. Second. That it is close to the track of vessels passing along the New England coast bound to and from Boston. Third. It would be safe and easy of ingress and egress in all weathers. Fourth. Even with one breakwater extending westwardly from Thatcher's Island, cutting off the most dangerous seas, which come from the northeast, valuable refuge would be gained.

During the reading of the foregoing the hammer fell.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. LEWIS was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. OATES.

Mr. OATES. I now ask the clerk to continue the reading down to and including page 5, and also on page 15.

Before the reading was concluded the hammer fell.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. OATES. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of what I have marked of this report be concluded, as it will take but a few minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule does not allow the Chair to entertain such a motion. The Chair presumes that there will be no objection to the gentleman printing the report as a part of his remarks.

Mr. OATES. But this question will be voted upon in a few moments, and if the report is not read prior to that time it will not be necessary to insert it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BAYNE. I propose an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

It shall be the duty of said board of engineers to examine into and report upon such other places upon said coast as may be suitable for harbor purposes, and to estimate the cost thereof.

Mr. STONE. I accept that amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. I would suggest to the gentleman to add the words "and the necessity therefor."

Mr. BAYNE. I accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas, and will incorporate it in the amendment.

Mr. STONE. Let the amendment be read as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving a national harbor of refuge of the first class at Sandy Bay or Cape Ann, Massachusetts, $100,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation or of any previous appropriation shall be expended until a new board of three engineers, one of whom shall be the resident engineer of the district, to be detailed immediately by the Secretary of War, shall decide that this point is the best location on the coast for such a harbor that shall serve all of the uses for which it may be needed; and it shall be the duty of said board of engineers to examine into and report upon such other places upon said coast as may be suitable for harbor purposes, and to estimate the cost thereof and the necessity therefor.

Mr. OATES. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. POTTER. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. BELFORD. I rise to a point of order. I insist that we have a right to know what is going on here. It is impossible in the confusion prevailing to hear a word.

Mr. BAYNE. I believe I am entitled to the floor for five minutes, since I have not occupied the time on my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. OATES. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he has observed in the report of the engineers that there is a difference between a harbor of the first class and such as that recommended at Cape Ann?

Mr. BAYNE. Yes, sir; I have observed the difference, and the proposition I have made, which has been embodied in the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, requires that board of engineers to make an examination along that coast and report the various points at which harbors may be constructed as well as the necessity therefor and the cost thereof.

Mr. OATES. But there is a distinction between a harbor of the first class and such as they say is necessary. They say an expenditure of $1,000,000 would be sufficient for the commercial purposes, whereas a harbor of the first class at Sandy Bay would cost eight or ten million dollars.

Mr. BAYNE. I am opposed to it on that account.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] a question. In the last clause of his amendment do the words "the necessity therefor" relate to the harbor at Sandy Bay or to all?

Mr. BAYNE. To all.

Mr. POTTER. In my judgment this expenditure, in the present state of the rivers and harbors of the country and of the defenses of the country, can not be justified. It is proposed to make upon the shore of Massachusetts, with the harbor of Boston upon one side within thirty miles, with the harbor of Portsmouth on the other side within thirty or forty miles, and the harbor of Gloucester just around this very point and but five or six miles removed from it—it is proposed to enter upon an expenditure which the engineers tell us will end in an outlay of eight or ten millions of dollars. And for what? In order to make a harbor of refuge.

Sir, there is far more demand for harbors for the living commerce of the country. At the great port of New York there are but twenty-two feet of water upon the bar at low tide, over which two-thirds of the commerce in question of this country flows. To enter now upon this expenditure or to take any step that can possibly lead to such an expenditure ought not to be permitted. Why, sir, there is no spot upon the shore of this country that is so well provided with harbors as the shore of Massachusetts.

I certainly, sir, can not be charged with any partiality against Massachusetts. She is my native State; my kindred are there. I passed the first years of my professional life within fifteen miles of this proposed harbor, and I do not believe it would have been thought of but for the fact that a Representative from that district, loving his section and loving the granite of his section and the interest of his section, has dwelt upon this thing until he has come to think that in the interests of benevolence, of a large world-wide charity, it would be wise to transfer these granite bowlders from these granite quarries and make this great harbor of refuge on the coast of Massachusetts. I have been importuned recently to give my influence in favor of building this harbor in order that these granite quarries might be utilized. It will make undoubtedly this district one of great activity. It will do more. It will be a monument to whoever can carry such a bill as this through this House. But, sir, it will be a monument of something more mournful than that. Up to this time Massachusetts, I believe, has never asked an appropriation of the General Government for rivers and harbors which it did not deserve. I do not believe that the Representatives of Massachusetts outside of this district will say that they believe this appropriation ought to be made in the interests of commerce or in the present state of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MULDROW obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. OATES.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the latter portion of the report of the engineers, which I have marked.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading as above.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] has expired and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STONE] is recognized.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STONE] to yield to me in order that I may move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. STONE. Can we not finish this matter this evening?

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. WILLIS. My object in moving that the committee do now rise is to ask the House to take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow. I have consulted as many members as I could consult conveniently and they seem to be generally willing that I should make that motion. With that view I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BLACKBURN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HAMMOND reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8130) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILLIS. I move that the House take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MILLIKEN. If we take a recess now until 10 o'clock to-morrow, will that continue this legislative day after 12 o'clock to-morrow?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will, unless the House should adjourn at some time before 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. MILLIKEN. So that we shall lose the hour which we would otherwise have under the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unless the House should adjourn at some time between 10 and 12 to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIS. I will say to my friend from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN] that if the House now take a recess until 10 o'clock, I will make a motion to adjourn before 12 o'clock to-morrow in order to save the morning hour.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] for his motion, but before submitting the motion the Chair asks consent to submit a message from the President of the United States.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I herewith transmit a communication from the Secretary of State relative to the Japanese Government's offer to donate a valuable piece of land to the United States in fee-simple for legation purposes, and earnestly recommend that the Executive be immediately authorized to accept the gift in the name of the United States, and to tender to his Imperial Japanese Majesty's Government a suitable expression of this Government's thanks for the generosity which prompted the presentation of so desirable a site of ground.

I deem it unnecessary to enlarge upon the statement of the Secretary of State. I feel certain, however, that a persual of his communication will at once commend itself to the favorable attention of Congress, and doubt not that the necessary authorization of Congress will be immediately given for the acceptance of the gift, as well as insure early action looking to the erection on the premises of a suitable public building for the use of the legation of the United States at Tokio. This step can not but be favorable to the United States in every honorable way, while the disinterested motives of a friendly foreign government deserves from us a proper and just recognition.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, D. C., February 5, 1885.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. BOYLE, of Pennsylvania, until Monday, February 9.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. ROSECRANS, leave was granted to George A. Jaegar to withdraw his papers, now with the Committee on Military Affairs, leaving copies on file.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, in response to inquiries of several members, I will say that if the motion for a recess prevails I will agree to make a motion to adjourn just before 12 o'clock to-morrow, so as to save the morning hour. I now move that the House take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] moves that the House do now take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow, pending which does the gentleman from Kentucky on the left [Mr. WHITE] renew his motion?

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move to adjourn.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ascertain whether I correctly understood the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] to say that if the House should now take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow he would move an adjournment before 12 o'clock to-morrow with a view of preserving the morning hour?

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman from Georgia understood me correctly.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky, to adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I move to amend the motion of my colleague [Mr. WILLIS] by striking out "10" and inserting "11."

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to inquire whether the object of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] is to continue this legislative day beyond 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky has already stated that such is not his purpose.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, to the motion of Mr. WILLIS, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 13, noes 149.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question then recurring on the motion of Mr. WILLIS for a recess, it was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess till 10 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

AFTER RECESS.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 10 o'clock a. m. (Friday, February 6), Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, there are so few members present, I move that the House take a recess for ten minutes.

The motion was agreed to; and a recess was accordingly taken.

The recess having expired, the House resumed its session.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WILLIS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and pending this motion I move that debate in Committee of the Whole on the pending amendment be limited to twenty minutes.

Mr. GIBSON. Twenty minutes on the section and pending amendment?

Mr. WILLIS. I modify my motion so as to limit debate on the section and amendments to twenty minutes.

The question being taken on the motion to limit debate, it was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. HAMMOND in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8130) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving a national harbor of refuge of the first class at Sandy Bay or Cape Ann, Massachusetts, $100,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation nor of any previous appropriation shall be expended until a new board of three engineers, one of whom shall be the resident engineer of the district, to be detailed immediately by the Secretary of War, shall decide that this point is the best location on the coast for such a harbor, that shall serve all the uses for which it may be needed; and it shall be the duty of said board of engineers to examine into and report upon such other places on said coast as may be suitable for harbor purposes, and to estimate the cost thereof and the necessity for such a harbor.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, as this amendment will give rise to some debate, I ask in the interest of public business that it be passed over for an hour. The House will then be fuller.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] asks unanimous consent that the pending amendment to lines 33, 34, and 35 be passed over for one hour.

Mr. HEPBURN. I object.

Mr. WILLIS. I hope my friend will not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STONE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. STONE. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS]?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] objected.

Mr. WILLIS. I saw no one rise. The rule is that a member objecting must rise.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa insist on his objection?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, sir; I object.

Mr. GIBSON. The gentleman will allow me to make a suggestion. The object of the proposition to pass this paragraph over is to avoid any bad feeling upon the part of other members——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests that any appeal to the gentleman from Iowa had better be made in private. [After a pause.] Does the gentleman from Iowa insist on his objection?

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not know how often it is necessary to make objection. I have done so twice.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say that a request was made that the Chair allow an appeal to be made to the gentleman from Iowa. The Chair did not know the effect of that appeal without asking the question. The gentleman from Iowa objects; and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STONE] has the floor.

Mr. STONE. I suppose, Mr. Chairman, that I am disclosing no secret and betraying no confidence when I state that the amendment which I have proposed to the pending clause of the bill was offered by me after a conference with the committee, and with reason to believe that it would be satisfactory to the committee, which, as members are aware, has been somewhat divided upon some questions in this bill; and judging from the indications upon this floor it was believed, in order to carry this bill, which is supposed to be of great importance to the country, that it was desirable to have if possible some unanimity of opinion and some concert of action in the committee. It was therefore to give effect to that opinion and to procure unanimity and concert of action to secure the passage of the bill that an effort was made in the committee to obtain for all the items of the bill as much harmony of action and unity of sentiment as possible, and which it was believed would result in the final passage of the measure, with such amendments as it was believed or as might be indicated during the course of the discussion of the bill were necessary. I offered the amendment, therefore, with that view, and did not anticipate that the member of the committee from Pennsylvania, who it seems was not present at the meeting of the committee, although I thought all were present, would offer the amendment which he did subsequently or immediately after mine was read.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I rise to-day for the purpose of opposing the amendment which the gentleman submitted for this reason: that I desire the bill, or this portion of it, shall pass with the amendment submitted by me and unhampered in its operation by the subsequent amendment suggested by him. I am opposed to his amendment, because it proposes to submit to a board of engineers the question of the necessity of a particular improvement of a river or harbor in this country. Now the question of the necessity of any such improvement is a question addressed to the legislative faculty of the country, and not to the executive. It is entirely inconsistent with our theory of government, with our established division of the powers of government, by which legislative questions are to be submitted to the legislative department of the Government and executive questions to the executive department, to refer a question whether or not the commercial needs of the country demand a particular improvement to a board of engineers. I repeat, sir, that such a submission is inconsistent with the doctrine of legislation, although I know very well when I make that remark that by a provision in the legislation of this country when a survey is first ordered it is believed to be expedient to refer the question of the commercial improvement of the place to a board of engineers, who shall pass upon the superficial question whether or not it appears to be an improvement required by the commerce of the country.

But the question which now confronts us—this particular improvement—was referred in the usual way to General Thom, and General Thom in his preliminary report distinctly declared and reported to the Government that there was need of a harbor of refuge at this point, and that this particular improvement was, in his judgment, a question of public necessity. Now my friend from New York [Mr. POTTER] suggested that this was the fruit of my own imagination or something to that effect, and that it was not a great need of commerce or a requirement of the country, nor was it demanded even by the Representatives of my portion of the country.

In response to the suggestion I wish to say to him that this enterprise did not originate with me. It came to this Congress before my time. It was reported here by General Thom before I had anything to do with Congress, and it was a pending enterprise before I had any connection with this business in any form.

Mr. HART was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. STONE.

Mr. STONE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit as I have already intimated that this is not a question to be decided by any narrow, material, or limited view of the needs of the commerce of the country. It is a question of humanity itself; a question that appeals to the liberal and enlightened policy of the age. It is a question as to whether or not an improvement of this character on this coast is demanded by all the considerations of public policy; and that question is one to be considered and decided, as I have said, by the legislative faculty of the country, and not by any power which may reside in any executive department. I say, therefore, that it is an abdication on the part of Congress to attempt to avoid the responsibility of the question by referring it in effect to a board of engineers. It is a question to be determined absolutely by considerations of public policy.

Why, Mr. Chairman, we have more than 3,000 miles of Atlantic seacoast, and there is not a single harbor of refuge of any pretension on that entire coast except the one at the mouth of the Delaware Bay. To-day England is constructing upon her east coast three large harbors of refuge to be built and paid for out of the imperial treasury, and the same policy prevails with all of the maritime powers upon the continent; and we have got to recognize the necessities of our vast seacoast by the construction of such harbors to meet the demands of commerce and humanity. For there is another consideration to which I wish especially to call the attention of the committee to show why we should not refer this subject to a board of engineers.

In the consideration of the question as to the necessity of establishing a harbor of refuge what are the conditions which are to govern Congress in its actions? Let me call the attention of this committee to the fact that it is not simply a question of the commercial needs of the country, but a question of humanity itself is involved. It is a question to be addressed peculiarly and solely to the legislative faculty of the Government. I ask, then, that this House shall consider and decide upon this question for itself if they believe that the time has come when this great nation of ours, with its vast resources and possibilities, shall begin to consider the mode of providing in the most ample way not only for the needs of commerce, but to meet the demands of humanity, as well as for the adequate defense of our coast in the event of foreign complications. If the House is to consider and reflect upon such things, it ought now to pass upon and decide the question whether or not this enterprise of constructing a great harbor of refuge upon the coast of Massachusetts is to be decided here or left to the possbilities of the future.

Now, one word more. I am quite willing, Mr. Chairman, to submit any question of an engineering character to the Corps of Engineers. I agree that in respect to the topography of the country, in respect to the best location on the coast, it is a very proper question for engineers to decide; therefore I am content to do it that way. But when it comes to surrendering the power of this Congress—to a submission of the legislative authority upon a question which has been long adjudicated, entered upon and decided, I submit it is only an expedient to avoid responsibility, and throw upon other persons a question which should be decided by the House.

Mr. HORR. Is debate exhausted on this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Five minutes remain on the formal amendment.

Mr. HORR. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that I agree most heartily with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STONE] as to this harbor of refuge. There are no outlays in this river and harbor bill that do more for the protection of life and property than the building of proper harbors into which vessels can go during storms. The idea of building a second-class harbor for that purpose is simply preposterous; that is simply providing for one class of vessels on the ocean and saying to the other class you can go to the bottom and we will do nothing for you.

Now, the breakwater on the Delaware, as every one who has examined this question knows, forms one of the best harbors now, and almost the only one, on the Atlantic coast. It is not an uncommon thing to see seven hundred vessels within those walls at once getting protection from the storm. We have on the lakes but one practical harbor of refuge, that is at Sandy Beach, on the coast of Michigan. It cost over $700,000, and almost weekly during the winter season you can see from one hundred to three hundred vessels driven within those walls to protect them from utter destruction.

On the coast of New England there is perhaps more commerce than on any other part of the coast except down in the vicinity of the Delaware Breakwater. Nothing is more needed than a first-class harbor opposite the New England coast, and if we build one, Mr. Chairman, let us have a good one.

I want to enter my protest against the American people having second-class things anywhere in the world. We ought to do first-class and nothing but first-class, and build first-class work, something that is in conformity with the dignity and power this nation ought to sustain among the nations of the earth. I do hope, therefore, the members of the House will stand by this committee in its decision that this harbor of refuge shall be built in such manner as to protect all the vessels that run upon the high seas.

Mr. HART, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Let the amendment be again read.

Mr. GIBSON. I wish to ask, Mr. Chairman, whether the vote would not first be upon the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STONE]?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not put that question because the gentleman from Massachusetts, as the Chair understood him, made the amendment to the amendment a part of his own amendment.

Mr. STONE. No; that is a mistake.

Mr. GIBSON. I understood the gentleman so on yesterday, but this morning he states differently.

Mr. STONE. I will explain, if the Chairman will allow me a moment. When the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] offered his amendment I accepted it, but after he offered it he modified it, referring the question of necessity also to the engineers. Some one asked whether that related to the whole work. He answered it did. Now, that was a material and vital change, referring the question of necessity to the engineers, and that is the precise point I stand here to contest and combat.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read from the RECORD.

The Clerk read as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BAYNE. I propose an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"It shall be the duty of said board of engineers to examine into and report upon such other places upon said coast as may be suitable for harbor purposes, and to estimate the cost thereof."

Mr. STONE. I accept that amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. I would suggest to the gentleman to add the words "and the necessity therefor."

Mr. BAYNE. I accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas, and will incorporate it in the amendment.

Mr. STONE. Let the amendment be read as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Improving a national harbor of refuge of the first class at Sandy Bay or Cape Ann, Massachusetts, $100,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation or of any previous appropriation shall be expended until a new board of three engineers, one of whom shall be the resident engineer of the district, to be detailed immediately by the Secretary of War, shall decide that this point is the best location on the coast for such a harbor that shall serve all of the uses for which it may be needed; and it shall be the duty of said board of engineers to examine into and report upon such other places upon said coast as may be suitable for harbor purposes, and to estimate the cost thereof and the necessity therefor."

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair remembers, that is all of it; and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STONE] having agreed to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE], and being silent after the gentleman from Pennsylvania modified it, the Chair treated the whole amendment as accepted.

Mr. STONE. If so, it was done under a misapprehension.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Massachusetts did not so intend——

Mr. STONE. Not at all.

The CHAIRMAN. In that case the Chair will put the question on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GIBSON. I ask unanimous consent that the question may be put on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] without the words "and the necessity therefor."

Mr. REAGAN. I understand, then, the question will be on the adoption of the last clause suggested, and I desire to say a word on it.

Mr. WILLIS. Is not debate exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HART] was exhausted and he withdrew his formal amendment.

Mr. WILLIS. But the House limited debate on all amendments to the paragraph.

Mr. REAGAN. I think there have been only ten minutes of discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. There has not been debate for a longer time than fifteen minutes, although there was considerable interruption, occupying much time. The gentleman from Texas will proceed.

Mr. REAGAN. I think it would be a mistake to adopt this amendment in a form which requires a report in favor of a harbor of refuge at that point without a report upon the question of its necessity. There is a fine harbor of twenty-two feet water within five miles of it. There is Boston Harbor, a deep and valuable harbor, within thirty miles. There is another harbor some forty miles north of it; all of them good harbors. And if it is intended as a defensive measure, the money that goes into it had much better go to the fortification and strengthening of the defenses all around the city of Boston, where the commerce is. Besides, I am informed that in bad weather sailing vessels, at least if the wind is from the ocean side, can not enter the harbor; in good weather they will not wish to enter the harbor.

I think we ought not to require the engineers to report a scheme like this when there is an abundance of harbors for all purposes of commerce and safety without letting the engineers pass on the question of the necessity for the harbor.

I add one more word. The gentleman from Massachusetts raised an objection to the improvement of another harbor to facilitate what is almost a continental commerce. One of his objections was that the cost of building it amounted to too much. Here is one proposed by him that will cost more, that for all purposes except to furnish a market for granite is useless.

Mr. OATES. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Does not the report of the engineers show the very thing proposed by this has been done, and if such a harbor is to be built Sandy Bay is the best on the coast? This is what this amendment is striking for now. But the board of engineers report against it on account of the immense cost.

Mr. REAGAN. They have reported against the necessity for it, and I do not wish them tied up so that they can not do it again.

Mr. STONE. I wish to say, if the gentleman from Texas referred to me when he said the gentleman from Massachusetts——

Mr. REAGAN. I did refer to the gentleman.

Mr. STONE. When the gentleman says I am opposed to an appropriation smaller than would ultimately be expended on account of this breakwater, an appropriation in any part of the country, he misconceives my position altogether. I have never in any way objected to any appropriation of any magnitude for any enterprise in any part of the country. If the gentleman imagines I am opposed to the appropriation of $1,000,000 or five millions for the city of Galveston or any other point he misconceives my position.

Mr. REAGAN. I must have misunderstood the gentleman. I certainly understood him to criticise and oppose that proposition.

Mr. STONE. The gentleman misunderstood me entirely. I want to say one word more to meet the argument of the gentleman from Texas. I am willing to submit the topographical question to engineers, and if the harbor is found to be inaccessible in bad weather, or for any other reason will not fulfill the conditions of a first-class harbor, the report will be unfavorable. But as I have already said the only question that should go to the engineers is the topographical question as to whether this is the best location, having regard to all the conditions of a first-class harbor.

Mr. CUTCHEON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto was limited to twenty minutes. The Chair has allowed some latitude because of certain interruptions, and the limit of debate has now been reached. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE].

The question being taken, there were—ayes 47, noes 52.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STONE].

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask that the amendment be reported again.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair directs the amendment to be reported again.

The amendment was again read.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 82, noes 20.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts. I ask that the question be again stated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair seems to be in some confusion from a want of recollection of what occurred yesterday with reference to this matter. The effort of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STONE] was to perfect the section before the motion to strike out was made. It is suggested, however, that the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STONE] was offered as a substitute for the section——

Mr. STONE. My motion was a substitute for the whole section.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Chairman, I think the RECORD will show that I yielded the floor for an amendment to be offered for the purpose of perfecting the section.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the recollection of the Chair. The Chair's recollection is that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STONE] asked consent of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] to amend the section before the motion of the gentleman from Alabama was made.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; but the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STONE] expressly stated in so many words when he offered the amendment that he offered it as a substitute.

Mr. REAGAN. I suppose there must be some mistake about it, because there would be no appropriation if this were a substitute for the other provision.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read from the RECORD what took place.

The Clerk read from the record of yesterday's proceedings, as follows:

Mr. STONE. I offer the following substitute for the paragraph which has been read, and I do it by instruction of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BAYNE. I take it the motion to strike out can be entertained whether the vote is upon a substitute or not.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard upon that point.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] will please repeat his statement.

Mr. BAYNE. I say that the motion to strike out will apply just as well if the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STONE] was offered as a substitute as if it was offered as an amendment; and on this principle, that the House, or the Committee of the Whole, House, has a right to perfect the proposition as nearly as it can, to get it in as good shape as it can. If it can get it in the best possible shape by adopting the substitute it adopts the substitute; but if, after having got the proposition into that shape, the committee is dissatisfied with the substitute, then it is within the power of the committee to strike it entirely out. That is the parliamentary law of the case. Under the rules the committee can strike out this substitute, even though it may stand in that position.

Mr. OATES. The substitute is an amendment.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] is just as much mistaken about that as if he had "burned his shirt." [Laughter.] According to Jefferson, who is one of our authorities, after you strike out and insert in Committee of the Whole, what you insert can not be stricken out by itself. You may insert A, B, and C, but after that you can not strike out A, B, and C, though you can move to strike out A, B, C, and D. The theory is based on the old English parliamentary practice, as far as the Committee of the Whole is concerned, that what we do in committee we can not undo. The House can undo it, but the committee can not. The motion to reconsider is denied in the Committee of the Whole on that same ground. The rules have never carried the motion to reconsider into Committee of the Whole; and that is based upon the broad parliamentary principle that it is vain to do a thing and then turn around and undo it.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, there is evidently a mistake all around as to the time at which this motion was made and the manner of the offering of the substitute. If the Clerk will look a little further back in the RECORD he will see that when this paragraph was reached and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] rose to make a motion to strike out the paragraph, I rose in my place and requested him to withhold that motion, stating that the committee had agreed upon a substitute, which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STONE] would offer. Thereupon, on that request, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] said, as near as I can recollect his language without having the RECORD before me: "Under those circumstances I will withhold my motion until the substitute is offered." That motion was withheld and the substitute was offered. After the substitute was offered and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] offered his amendment some difficulty arose about that, and we have now adopted the substitute of the committee offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STONE] in place of the original proposition. That is the state of the facts in relation to this matter.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this is a matter of words rather than of things. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] moved to strike out the paragraph. He yielded for the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STONE], announcing in the first instance that he desired to offer an amendment——

Mr. STONE. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Subsequently the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STONE] characterized the amendment as a substitute. Now, what is the substitute? The substitute says, "Improving national harbor of refuge of first class at Sandy Bay, Cape Ann, Massachusetts, $100,000." So far it is the original paragraph precisely in terms. Then it appends a proviso. What is that but an amendment? You may call it a substitute, but you incorporate in your substitute first the identical paragraph, and then append to it a proviso. That is—I was going to say "whipping the devil around the stump," but that is not an elegant metaphor. I will say, however, that it is simply evading the point by calling the proposition a "substitute" instead of an amendment, when it is to all intents and purposes an amendment.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. There is a complete striking out and a complete inserting.

Mr. CUTCHEON. No; you do not strike out anything. You leave the original paragraph intact and simply add a proviso. Calling the proposition a substitute does not make it a substitute.

Mr. STONE. In order to shorten this matter I have no objection to its being passed upon in the mode suggested by the gentleman last on the floor [Mr. CUTCHEON]; that is, I am perfectly willing that the motion to strike out shall be passed upon by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. THOMAS. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STONE] can not consent to an unparliamentary proceeding, and that this is not an amendment, the assertion to the contrary notwithstanding. Under the rules a paragraph in the bill may be amended; and there may be amendments to an amendment with the view of perfecting the section. But when the section has been stricken out and a substitute adopted in lieu thereof, a motion to strike out is not in order, as the House has already expressed its opinion upon the point and adopted the substitute.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That is correct.

Mr. THOMAS. Therefore I say, although the gentleman from Massachusetts may be willing to agree that a vote be taken upon the proposition to strike out, his assent avails nothing, for the House has already expressed itself with reference to this paragraph—has adopted a substitute, and that is the end of it.

Mr. ROWELL and Mr. OATES rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that there has been enough debate on this question, but will hear gentlemen further if they so desire.

Mr. ROWELL. I want to make a single suggestion. When the vote was taken this morning the chairman put the question upon the "amendment" of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and the Committee of the Whole adopted it as an "amendment" and so understood it. If we voted upon an "amendment" and it turns out that it was offered as a substitute, then we have not voted upon the substitute.

Mr. WASHBURN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on this question.

Mr. WASHBURN. Whatever this point of order may be worth, it seems to me we may just as well have a fair, square, honest vote on this proposition and have it at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest that the quickest way to reach a vote is to allow the Chair to dispose of the question of order.

The gentleman from Massachusetts offered a substitute which repeats in hæc verba the language of the bill and simply adds a proviso. It has been treated as an amendment to the paragraph and so debated. Not one single word of the paragraph was stricken out or changed by this proposition, but simply a proviso added. While it is true that a motion to strike out and insert would operate as claimed by gentlemen who have spoken, the Chair thinks that in its effect this was not such a motion, and therefore will resolve the doubt by pursuing his original idea—that the question in order is upon the motion proposed by the gentleman from Alabama to strike out the section.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 74, noes 42:

Mr. STONE. Tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers are demanded. As many as are in favor of ordering tellers will rise.

Mr. LONG (during the count by the chairman). Is not my colleague [Mr. STONE] entitled to tellers, there having been no quorum?

A MEMBER. That point was not made. [Cries of "Too late!"]

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-one members have risen to order tellers—not a sufficient number. Tellers are refused. The motion of the gentleman from Alabama to strike out the section is adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Wood's Holl, Mass.: To complete improvement, $8,600.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I move to amend by striking out the last word. I rise for the purpose of calling attention——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky will suspend. The Chair is informed that when the motion to limit debate was made this morning by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] it was put and adopted in the form of a motion to limit debate on the "section." If that action be now strictly construed, debate is not in order.

Mr. WILLIS. I recognize the fact that as the motion was stated and adopted it would prevent debate on every other paragraph of this section; but I feel it would be improper to take advantage of a slip of language on my part. My intention in making the motion was to limit debate not on the "section" but on the paragraph. Therefore, as the paragraph has now been passed, I make no point as to debate having been closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that it is very common to call these paragraphs "sections," though technically they are not such. Hence the inquiry made by the Chair. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] is recognized.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I move to amend by striking out the last word. I rise for the purpose of calling attention to two lines which in the hurry of our proceedings were passed over without giving us a chance to offer any amendments. I refer to lines 27 and 28, providing for the improvement of Plymouth Harbor. I am aware the Chair has ruled that we have passed these lines——

Mr. GIBSON. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman has stated that his object in rising now is to discuss a paragraph that has been passed; and I submit that upon his own statement he is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken. The gentleman from Kentucky will proceed in order.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. If I am not mistaken, the river and harbor bill is still under discussion. In order to understand the whole bill it is necessary to understand its parts. It is a well-known mathematical axiom that the whole is only the sum of all the parts. Now, I am going to talk about two parts of this bill in connection with my amendment to lines 36 and 37. My amendment is to lines 36 and 37, and I desire to call the attention of the committee to what was done yesterday. When the paragraph relating to Plymouth Harbor was read it was passed over in the hurry of debate without the offering of the proper amendment. Now, in the last Congress we appropriated but one-third of what the engineers said was necessary to complete that work. This year in this bill we appropriate less than one-third of what they say will be necessary to complete that work. In other words, we appropriated $10,000. This year we appropriate $5,000. The engineers tell us that $18,000 will complete that work. We need only appropriate $18,000 to complete that work, where there is some commerce, where there is a harbor, and where we can do something for the benefit of commerce.

What did we do yesterday? Instead of completing the harbor at Plymouth we put in this bill an appropriation of $6,000 for Hingham Harbor, where there is no harbor and where there is no commerce. How much confidence will the people of the United States have in Congress if when Congress says we are not to rely upon the engineers and then Congress turns round and refuses to appropriate money to complete an important harbor—the oldest harbor on the Atlantic coast—when only $18,000 are required to complete it, put in only an appropriation of $5,000 for that work——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I move to strike out the two last words; and I desire to call attention of the committee to this fact: We can not impose on the country, although we may put weight enough in this bill to carry it through.

Mr. WAIT. I make this point of order in this way: Can any member of the House consume the entire time that is supposed to be devoted here to the discussion of this bill, and can no other party have an opportunity to offer an amendment or to discuss the bill?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I will yield to the gentleman from Connecticut if he wants the floor to discuss the bill. I always yield to gentlemen of age.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman allow the Chair to rule on the point of order?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can only rule as he did yesterday, that when gentlemen make propositions the Chair knows no way to stop debate except by rising and having debate limited in the House. The Chair can not do otherwise than recognize the gentleman.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I can not yield for that motion just now.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to ask the Chair if he feels bound to recognize the same gentleman over and over again to the exclusion of the balance of the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state in that regard that no other gentleman asked for recognition. The gentleman from Kentucky is entitled to the floor and will proceed.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. This harbor of Wood's Holl, Mass., is under discussion. Now, in regard to the part of the bill passed over the committee have ignored, and every important harbor which the engineers have reported on from time to time which has a great deal of commerce, where $18,000 would complete the work, and this bill gives to that harbor by the action of yesterday $5,000 only. Why, sir, that will not do for the keep of the plant of the machinery and the man in charge, to say nothing of the prosecution of the work. It is simply a continuation of a tax without any beneficent result.

Now, I want to compare that with an appropriation made yesterday for a harbor, so called, on that same coast, within a few miles of Plymouth. I refer to Hingham Harbor, where there is no harbor, where there is no commerce, and only one steamboat can run at all. Yet for that little harbor, so called, this bill carries now $6,000, and yet for Plymouth, within a cannon-shot of Hingham, you only give one-third the amount and tell us it will complete it. I point this out as an enormity in this bill, and that is all I desire to say.

Mr. LONG. I rise to oppose the amendment, simply to say the gentleman from Kentucky, who is not, perhaps, thoroughly informed as to Hingham Harbor, has made some statements which I must correct.

A MEMBER. Nobody pays any attention to it.

Mr. LONG. Very well, then, I will not detain the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Newport, R. I.: Continuing improvement, $12,500.

Mr. SPOONER. I move, in line 41, to amend as follows:

Strike out "$12,500" and insert "$20,000."

Mr. Chairman, the harbor at Newport, as stated in the report of the engineers, and as should be well understood, is one of the most important harbors on the coast, providing a safe roadstead and anchorage.

The inner harbor is a harbor of refuge very much required on that part of our coast. It is a harbor of national importance. The important Government works of Fort Adams are there; the naval training school is located there. The work now progressing is to obtain a uniform depth of fifteen feet in the channel and inner harbor. Among the great commercial interests of that port which I think it is desirable the committee should provide for are the great steamers of the Old Colony Steamboat Company, running from New York to Newport and thence to Fall River, in the State of Massachusetts. It is a great line of intercommunication and inland travel. On these steamers during the last year there were carried about 250,000 tons of freight and passengers to the number of about 270,000.

The depth of the water in the channel, as indicated on the chart at mean low water, is now thirteen feet; but as there are times, particularly in stormy weather, when there will be instead of thirteen feet at mean low water but twelve feet in mid-channel, it is earnestly urged that the project now in progress for completing the depth to fifteen feet should be continued, as recommended by the engineers.

The supervisor of the Old Colony Steamboat Company, in his communication to the engineer in charge of the work, says;

That until a depth of fifteen feet is obtained it is impossible for our great steamers to enter the harbor at all stages of the tide.

Any of the steamers of this line—with an ordinary load will ground in the present channel at extreme low water.

The amendment I offer, Mr. Chairman, contemplates a moderate portion only of the appropriations recommended by the engineers. The engineers recommended an appropriation for the present year of $50,000. The committee have cut this down, as I have already suggested in my remarks on yesterday, to but 25 per cent. of the estimate, or $12,500, and I simply ask at this time that the harbor of Newport, important as it is in its commercial relations, should have at least that moderate consideration of its necessities which is asked for by the amendment, and which seeks an appropriation of but 40 per cent. of the amount recommended by the engineers. I hope the amendment will be adopted. I ask it in the interest of existing commerce, and not of any problem of what may possibly be required hereafter.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I hardly think it is necessary to reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Rhode Island in support of his amendment, because the committee have acted carefully in the consideration of this matter, and have given all that they deemed necessary. I can only say, therefore, that this harbor has been treated exactly as other harbors, except in cases where a small amount would complete the whole work; and in comparison to the amount of shipping to be benefited this harbor has received as much under this bill as has been allowed to any other harbor of equal importance.

Mr. WILLIS. And there are $20,000 of the last appropriation on hand yet unexpended.

Mr. THOMAS. As suggested by the chairman of the committee, and as the report shows, there are $20,000 of the last appropriation on hand unexpended, which, with the amount allowed in this bill, will be all that can be expended through this season. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. SPOONER. If it be necessary, I shall move to strike out the last word, to say that the amount on hand is simply the appropriation which is to be used for the present fiscal year. It has no reference to the next year. I ask a vote upon the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 36, noes 65.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after line 41:

"Improving harbor and breakwater at Block Island, R. I.: Completing improvement, $15,000."

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. Chairman, the objection which was urged by gentlemen on the committee to the last amendment, asking the increase of appropriation, certainly does not apply to this. This is one of the very works to which the gentleman from Illinois alluded, where but a small amount of additional appropriation is required to complete the works now in progress. The recommendation of the engineer in charge is that $15,000 should be appropriated for the completion of the work, which is the completion of the breakwater at Block Island.

The harbor at Block Island, Mr. Chairman, is a natural harbor of refuge in certain states of wind and weather, and will be a perfect harbor of refuge after the completion of the breakwater now in progress. It is of the utmost importance to the commerce of the country which passes along that coast and in the neighborhood of Block Island, which is a very dangerous locality. It also affords refuge for the fishing fleets off the banks in that neighborhood, and is of great importance in the interests of the general commerce of the country.

I ask, Mr. Chairman, that this project may have the fair and reasonable consideration of the committee. Fifteen thousand dollars will complete the work now in progress. A member of the committee has said that they have made these appropriations generally or only in those cases where the amount would complete the work. It will do it here. It is a meritorious improvement.

Mr. THOMAS. I only desire to call the attention of the committee to this paragraph in the report of the Chief of Engineers to show why the committee rejected this project:

It is proposed, with the available remainder of the appropriations of August 2, 1882, and the amount appropriated by the act of Congress of July 5, 1884, to replace the Government wharf within the inner harbor by a substantial structure. To this wharf, which is in a decayed condition, all the freight carried to and from the island is brought, and at it are landed the United States mails and all the supplies for the four light-houses on the island and the steam siren (fog-signal).

It will be seen that the engineer in charge proposes and is engaged in building a wharf upon which to land freights for the inhabitants of the island. It is a private enterprise. It is for the improvement of private property, and not in the interest of general commerce. It is not even in the interest of shipping that may suffer from storms or would be seeking a harbor of refuge, but is simply to build wharves at which private freights for the inhabitants of the island may be landed. The committee thought it was not safe to engage or to go further in an enterprise which was to be directed to the improvement of private property alone. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. SPOONER. Have I any time remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has one minute remaining.

Mr. SPOONER. I move to strike out the last word, as I want a little more than one minute, although I shall be very brief. The gentleman who has just addressed the committee has inadvertently only read a portion of the report referred to. If he will turn to a prior page he will see what was the original condition of that island. The report says:

Before the construction of the present harbor of refuge Block Island had no harbor which afforded protection for decked vessels. The only ones used were open boats, which, on the approach of storms, were hauled up on the beach by oxen. The largest of these boats were of about ten tons burden.

There are, as has been already indicated by what the gentleman from Illinois himself has read, four light-houses on the island. There is the Government post-office there. There is the fog-signal, which is to be cared for. All these are matters of Government interest; and this wharf which has been referred to had to be built in the first instance for the benefit of these Government works and those who are concerned in managing the affairs of the light-houses, and to enable the United States mails to be landed upon the island and taken from the island.

It is well known that Block Island has grown to be a place of great resort. There are regular lines of steamers running there daily during the summer season and one steamer which runs there during the entire year. If gentlemen of the committee do not apprehend the importance of this little harbor of refuge I believe it is because they have not given that careful consideration to this project which has been given to other projects far less meritorious which are included in the appropriation in this bill.

I hope, sir, that justice will be done to the little harbor of Block Island, and to the hardy fishermen and sailors who look there for a harbor of refuge.

A MEMBER. Is it a Government wharf?

Mr. SPOONER. It is a Government wharf.

Mr. THOMAS. In reply to the gentleman from Rhode Island I will say that the breakwater has been completed; the harbor of refuge is in a perfect state now, and the engineer expressly states that the present project is to build this wharf where the mails are landed. The hardy fishermen have complete protection in this harbor of refuge now. And shall we go on and complete wharves for the landing of freights of private individuals after we have protected the hardy fishermen of Block Island? I protest against it.

Mr. SPOONER rose.

Mr. THOMAS. I yield for a question.

Mr. SPOONER. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois to read a portion of the report, which will correct the misinformation which he has just given to the committee. The harbor of refuge and breakwater have not been completed, and the repairs on the Government wharves are but a trifling item of what is asked for in this appropriation.

Mr. THOMAS. I read this from the report:

It is proposed, with the available remainder of the appropriations of August 2, 1882, and the amount appropriated by the act of Congress of July 5, 1884, to replace the Government wharf within the Inner Harbor by a substantial structure. To this wharf, which is in a decayed condition, all the freight carried to and from the island is brought, and at it are landed the United States mails and all the supplies for the four light-houses on the island and the steam siren (fog-signal).

Mr. SPOONER. Read the next paragraph.

Mr. THOMAS. The next paragraph is as follows:

It is also proposed to fill the gap in the breakwater to exclude the heavy sea which now rolls through it in easterly storms into the anchorage, and of which complaint is made.

The estimated cost of the last project was $30,000. Of this amount there has been appropriated the sum of $15,000.

That is the whole of it.

Mr. SPOONER. As I understand the portion of the report now read the last-mentioned project refers entirely to the completion of the breakwater.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. SPOONER].

The question being taken, there were—ayes 48, noes 72.

The CHAIRMAN (having announced the vote). The amendment is not agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of no quorum is made too late. The Chair had announced the vote.

Mr. SPOONER. I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The demand is too late.

Mr. SPOONER. Why too late?

Mr. REED, of Maine. I wish to suggest to the Chair that it is impossible to make the point of no quorum until the Chair has announced the vote.

Mr. SPOONER. How can I tell whether a quorum has voted until the result is announced?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was mistaken.

Mr. WILLIS. I hope the point of no quorum will be waived.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was mistaken. The gentleman from Rhode Island, Mr. SPOONER, and the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. WILLIS, will act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 59, noes 106.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. McCOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the sums by this act appropriated shall be expended only for such of the rivers, harbors, ice-harbors, harbors of refuge, creeks, bayous, canals, and reservoirs named in this act as the Secretary of War, under the direction of the President, shall determine: And provided further, That in no case shall the expenditure for any one purpose exceed the sum now designated by this act for that purpose.

Mr. McCOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I propose this amendment in good faith, and it shall receive at least one vote, from the conviction that such a proviso would save from waste many thousands and perhaps a million or millions of dollars. I want the responsibility for this expenditure placed somewhere. While some worthy gentlemen are sensitive respecting this bill, no one seems responsible for all of it. This debate has disclosed the fact that the engineers are not responsible. The report of the Chief of Engineers warns us that the estimates of the engineers are not to be considered as carrying with them a recommendation of the need of the expenditure.

The House thus far has not contrived to make any amendment of this bill looking to the reduction or material modification of appropriations. The members of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors themselves in this debate, one after another, have shown this House that they are not united upon the policy of the main items of appropriation in this bill. Nor has there yet been a single member of that committee who, when pressed, has not admitted in effect that there are many lesser items in the bill which are of doubtful propriety or public need.

Now, Mr. Chairman, since we appropriated $13,000,000 for rivers and harbors last session, and propose to add $12,000,000 in the present session, if it be true, as I do not doubt it is true, that the committee were hurried for want of time, it seems to me that we are making too much haste to expend $25,000,000 by the appropriations of this Congress for rivers and harbors. Shall we in one Congress expend a sum which equals nearly one-fourth of all the money expended by all the Congresses for that purpose from the beginning of the Government until this Congress met? For that total is but $111,299,464.79.

This is an appropriation bill. Why was not time taken to ascertain the total amount appropriated and to print it at the foot of the bill? I wish the printed bill had disclosed to the members of this House the estimate of the Secretary of War, which recommended but $8,177,000 for rivers and harbors this year. It is not a sufficient answer to say that this practice has not heretofore obtained. It has been so often urged in this debate that a river and harbor bill is like a general appropriation bill in all else, shall it not resemble it in this respect! Such a showing would make plain that this bill proposes to expend three dollars where two would suffice for the public need.

Without my amendment this bill as an annual appropriation bill in effect directs the President to expend $12,000,000 in so brief a period that the expenditure can not be made economically and advantageously.

Mr. McCOMAS. I ask five minutes more.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I am sure my friend from Maryland [Mr. McCOMAS] has offered this resolution in good faith, but when I assure him that that is the exact law at the present time I think he will not desire to press his proposition.

Mr. McCOMAS. Mr. Chairman, with all due deference to the able chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors [Mr. WILLIS], let me say that this amendment is intended only to follow in the line of the river and harbor veto message of President Arthur, which had the approval of the country at large; and when the President himself said, under the advice of his Attorney-General, that if that money was appropriated he would feel himself directed and compelled to expend it all, it seems to me that there can be no better reason for adopting such a proviso as this.

There is a public sentiment steadily gathering favor in this country that the President should have the power to veto items of an appropriation bill. Can we not safely in this bill, which no one member warmly defends in its entirety, and which, though prepared in haste, embraces many new projects involving enormous expenditures, intrust the new President with a discretion which may prevent the extravagant waste of public moneys? If there be a provision of that sort inserted somewhere in this bill, if my amendment be adopted, I believe the result will be that in the next Congress we may find millions saved.

The engineer report, barely printed when this bill was taken up, shows us that probably millions of the funds heretofore appropriated remain unexpended. Shall we pile up these millions in addition by hurried legislation? Shall we not by my amendment fix the responsibility somewhere? Shall we not hold the President and Secretary of War responsible? Let the bill indicate to them the objects which Congress, with a too hurried examination, believes to be worthy of the nation's care. Their more deliberate selection may be trusted to determine which of these need the money. It may result that millions may be saved.

If the Secretary of War, under the direction of the incoming President, confines the expenditure of these moneys to the improvement of rivers and harbors navigable within the legal definition of the word navigable, as defined by the Supreme Court, the nation will not suffer, and the tax-payers of the nation will applaud Congress for adopting this proviso.

The Supreme Court (11 Wallace, 411) calls a river "a navigable water of the United States when it forms by itself, or by its connection with other waters, a continuous highway over which commerce is or may be carried on with other States or foreign countries in the customary modes in which such commerce is conducted by water;" and declares that "if a river is not of itself a highway for commerce with other States or foreign countries, or does not form such a highway by its connection with other waters, and is only navigable between different places within the State, then it is not a navigable water of the United States, but only a navigable water of the State."

If at the next session we should learn by the operation of this amendment that much of the money had been saved because the harbor or river or creek named in the bill was only a navigable water within a State, or, being within a State, was not navigable, or was not navigated, or could not be made navigable, the tax-payers of the country would realize the benefit of this provision. The Hennepin Canal may be thus delayed; but if it be the great good to the Northwest which its friends claim, the delay may enlist the Northern States to bear a share in proportion to their peculiar benefits thereform.

Why, Mr. Chairman, the State of New York, when it was not yet the Empire State, when it was scarcely more populous than Connecticut or Maryland, constructed the Erie Canal. I find in this bill the two Kanawhas, and am reminded that Washington, in the days of the Potomac Company, in a letter to Governor Johnson, of Maryland, as early as July 20, 1770, recommended the connection of these waters on either side of the Alleghanies, "upon a more enlarged plan, as a means of becoming the channel of conveyance of the extensive and valuable trade of a rising empire." But he did not dream of asking Congress alone to do it. Virginia and Maryland expended millions upon the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal as it extended toward the Ohio River.

Now, who in these days expects the State of West Virginia to go hand in hand with Congress in putting locks on the Great and Little Kanawha? Instead, its demand upon Congress grows in frequency, and we are rapidly nearing the time when the General Government will be expected to provide, where there is a color of national advantage, for every variety of State or local benefit. As a friend of a liberal national policy I protest against its abuse. Why is it that the apparition of the constitutional lawyer, from his ghost-walk on the other side of the House, does not stalk across the floor in this debate? Can it be that so many of the habitual constitutional lawyers of this House reside hard by the green pastures and still waters of the streams now favored and first made famous by this bill, that like the ghost in Hamlet they scent the morning air, and therefore do not materialize on days when we are discussing the river and harbor bill?

Galveston Harbor, too, may wait, having received one and a half millions already, until its predicted commerce has still more fully developed. There is probably much of truth in these glowing predictions. But we are asked to expend this money not for the commerce that is, but for the commerce that is to be.

Mr. Chairman, I have heard the committee complain justly and pathetically of their prolonged sessions, extending far into the evenings——

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I object to the adoption of the pending proposition, and I do so upon this ground: It is admitted that under the law all these works upon rivers and harbors are to be executed under the direction of the Secretary of War, who is but an agent of the President of the United States. But this proposition goes further. It proposes to take from the legislative branch of this Government the right to determine where improvements shall be made. It attempts to set up the judgment of the Executive over that of the representative bodies, the Senate and this House, making the President a virtual dictator to say when and where improvements shall be made. I believe this to be contrary to the spirit and genius of our institutions—contrary to the theory of our Government. I believe that the power to determine these questions is vested in this House and the Senate, not in the Executive of the United States.

If we should go upon the theory proposed by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McCOMAS], why is there any necessity of our sitting here and discussing the propriety or impropriety of any measure? Why not relegate the whole subject to the President of the United States, and let him direct alone where the public money shall be expended and for what purpose?

I protest against any such idea. I believe that it is the duty of Congress to hold on to the trust which has been placed in its hands by the people of this country, and to guard with jealous care every prerogative that the Constitution gives it. We have no right to delegate this authority to the President of the United States, and I hope most earnestly that the jealousy with which the representatives of the people ought to guard their rights will prompt them to stand here and vote solidly against this proposition.

Mr. STORM obtained the floor and said: I yield my time to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McCOMAS] that he may conclude his remarks.

Mr. McCOMAS. I thank the gentleman for his courtesy. I was about to say—and I shall soon conclude—when I heard how late they sat on these short winter days, while they were regaled with accounts of the prospective trade of Galveston, as their eyes wearied with gazing at the magic circles drawn on the remarkable Galveston map which I hold in my hand, so liberally strewn about our desks to-day, I can fancy that therein they saw the countless flocks of sheep, traveling in these straight lines, flocking toward Galveston from half a continent, and the cattle on a thousand hills of the great West "winding slowly o'er the lea" toward Galveston Harbor. I suspect they turned from the map toward the hills across the Potomac River and the winter evening sky, nowhere brighter than when seen through their committee-room window; I fancy they—

> Saw the heavens filled with commerce, argosies of magic sails,
> Pilots of the purple twilight laden down with costly bales.

These visions in the sky, the enthusiasm of Captain Eads, and the imaginative computation of countless bales of cotton that might yet come pressing to that market shall not tempt me to wager $7,000,000 of public money upon the opinion of Captain Eads.

When specialists differ, "when doctors disagree," when the Army engineers and the civil engineers are at variance in opinion on this question, we are to have millions spent upon that harbor as an experiment.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman will permit me one word? I know he does not want to fight "a man of straw;" and I will say to him that by unanimous vote of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors Captain Eads is now entirely eliminated from the bill; and the appropriation for Galveston Harbor, which has called forth the denunciation of the gentleman, has been so amended in the committee that, with the exception of one member—and in this remark I do not exclude the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE]—the appropriation as now agreed upon has the approbation of the whole committee.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I hope the chairman of our committee will except me from the statement just made. I voted in the committee against the "elimination" of Captain Eads.

Mr. McCOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to learn by this disclosure that the "man of straw" has only just now been burned up and taken out of this debate.

Mr. WILLIS. And now I hope the gentleman will let him rest.

Mr. McCOMAS. But, Mr. Chairman, it matters not to me whether Captain Eads disappears from this bill or not. He is not "a man of straw;" he is of sterner stuff. I have great respect for him as a man of genius; but I am looking to the interests of the people of this country, who I believe would have these appropriations so reduced that we may save some money for the defense of the harbors we have, and for the protection of commerce already thriving.

The great commerce of Baltimore is already pressing for relief. The channel to that great harbor is only deepened one-half its width, and actual vessels with present commerce freighted deep must wait, or the vessels heavily laden must still go bumping into the sides of the submerged banks of the harbor channel, and you propose $75,000 this year to aid the present commerce of Baltimore, in order to expend this year $750,000 for the development of commerce which may come to Galveston. Why not apply some of this money to coast defenses, to protecting the harbors you already have, whereon stand great cities stored with the grain of half the farmers in America, wherein ride countless vessels, all defenseless against the navies of the world?

Why not build up your Navy, so that we may protect our native and naturalized citizens at least against the naval armament of powers like Portugal or Chili, or at least Ecuador.

Adopt my amendment, and you will, as I believe, provide for a great saving of the money sorely needed, where you can alike provide for the common defense and the general welfare.

Mr. WILLIS. On yesterday when I made the motion to take a recess it was with the understanding that I should make the motion to adjourn at this time; and in pursuance of that understanding, while I regret we have not made more progress with the river and harbor bill——

A MEMBER. I do not.

Mr. WILLIS. I know the gentleman does not; I never think for him.

Mr. REED, of Maine. What induces the gentleman to make observations to me; I made none to him?

Mr. WILLIS. I am glad to know you have not.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I have said nothing to provoke any such attack as that.

Mr. WILLIS. I understood the gentleman to interject right there.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I interjected nothing.

Mr. WILLIS. You are rejected then from my remark.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I submit on my part, not making any observation, the gentleman from Kentucky ought not to preface his motion to adjourn by so much advice to this side of the House. I submit if he wants to make a motion to adjourn, that is sufficient.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman from Kentucky has never been guilty once where the other gentleman has a dozen times, and the rebuke comes with a great deal of grace from him.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I think it does. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. WILLIS. I rise pursuant to my agreement for the purpose of moving that the House adjourn.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will first have to rise.

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly. I will make the motion that the committee rise.

Mr. DUNN. I hope the committee will not rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is not debatable.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 123, noes 37.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I call for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BLACKBURN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HAMMOND reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8130) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I called for tellers on the motion that the committee rise, and the chairman disregarded my call.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has no knowledge of proceedings in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union except as reported.

Mr. WILLIS. I move the House do now adjourn.

Mr. DUNN. I hope the House will not adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The ayes seem to have it.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 11 o'clock and 59 minutes a. m.) the House adjourned.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster-General, stating, in response to a resolution of the 4th instant, that the erasures and interlineations in the documentary history of the railway mail service were simply the result of the final revision of the document, and not to be taken as a part of it; which was referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HARRISON. I am directed by the Committee on Territories to report back the bill (H. R. 489) to extend the laws of the United States over certain unorganized territory south of the State of Kansas, and to state that a Senate bill of the same import has been referred to the Committee on Public Lands. The Committee on Territories therefore ask to be discharged from the further consideration of this bill, and that it be referred, together with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Public Lands.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6946) for the relief of Margaret McCarty, to report it adversely. I wish to state that the adverse report is based upon the fact that since the action of the House a pension has been allowed by the Pension Office. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2161) granting a pension to Harvey Crane, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 1655) granting a pension to Newton J. Burris;
A bill (H. R. 6882) granting a pension to John Otis;
A bill (H. R. 2002) for the relief of Mrs. Jennie E. Johnson;

A bill (S. 2160) granting a pension to Robert Walker.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon, which were agreed to; and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 476) for the relief of Seth Colvin;
A bill (S. 926) granting a pension to Levi H. Naron;
A bill (S. 1436) granting a pension to Francis M. Cox;
A bill (S. 1443) granting a pension to Peter Riley;
A bill (S. 1515) granting a pension to Beverly Post; and A bill (H. R. 2100) granting a pension to Mary Allen.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1084) granting a pension to Dorothea Bothner, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CULLOM, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1653) granting a pension to John H. Crumb, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. CULLOM. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2547) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Frances L. Thomas, widow of Maj. Gen. George H. Thomas, to report it with an amendment. I will state that I shall favor the original bill giving the widow the pension proposed to be given by the bill sent to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. CULLOM. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1633) granting a pension to James Bond, to report it favorably and without amendment.

Mr. JACKSON. I ask leave to submit in connection with that report the views of the minority.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the views of the minority will be received and printed.

Mr. CULLOM, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1416) granting a pension to Mrs. Charlotte Hackett, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CULLOM. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7659) granting a pension to Mrs. Emily L. Alvord, to submit an adverse report thereon. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar. I call the attention of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to the fact that I am making an adverse report on the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask to have the bill placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois in reporting the bill made the same request. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. CONGER. I inquire whether there is a written report accompanying the bill?

Mr. CULLOM. There is.

Mr. BLAIR. I understood that there would be submitted the views of the minority on the bill, and that it is not a unanimous report adverse to the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. The report in the case sets out the facts. I expect for myself to oppose the majority report which I submit. I am in favor of the passage of the bill notwithstanding the action of the committee.

I am also instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2377) granting a pension to Mrs. Emily L. Alvord, to report it adversely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2484) granting a pension to the widow of the late Commander S. Dana Greene, United States Navy, reported it adversely, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. By direction of the Committee on Pensions, I also report the bill (H. R. 7830) granting a pension to the widow of the late Commander S. Dana Greene, United States Navy, adversely, recommending its indefinite postponement, in which case I desire to submit the views of the minority favoring the passage of the bill. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. BLAIR. By direction of the Committee on Pensions, I also report adversely the bill (S. 957) granting a pension to Margaret D. Marchand, recommending its indefinite postponement. I submit also with the report the views of the minority favoring the passage of the bill. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. BLAIR. By direction of the Committee on Pensions, I report adversely the bill (S. 2428) granting a pension to Margaret B. Harwood, recommending its indefinite postponement. I submit with the report also the views of the minority, and on behalf of the minority I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar, and that the views of the minority be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar and the views of the minority will be printed, if there be no objection.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 6311) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah S. Sampson;
A bill (H. R. 3527) granting a pension to George A. Marshall; and
A bill (H. R. 6956) granting a pension to Maria H. Sargent.

Mr. VAN WYCK, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1803) granting an increase of pension to George A. Washburn, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 5800) for the relief of Sarah B. Jackson;
A bill (H. R. 4248) granting a pension to William Harbeson;
A bill (H. R. 7295) granting a pension to Albert D. Simmons; and
A bill (H. R. 6934) granting a pension to Ann J. Williams.

Mr. CULLOM, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3058) to amend section 1889 of chapter 1, title 23, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relative to general incorporation acts of Territories, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. DOLPH. On the 12th of January last I reported, by direction of the Committee on Public Lands, the bill (H. R. 100) for the relief of certain pre-emption and homestead settlers in California, adversely. I have this morning received a communication from the Attorney-General, accompanied by copies of letters from the district attorney of the United States for the district of California of January 5 and January 24, which I think should be printed with the report. The report has not yet been received from the Public Printer owing to the fact that certain maps accompany it, and the Printer is waiting on the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to prepare the maps so that they may be printed in connection with the report. I ask that the papers be printed as an addendum to the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon, from the Committee on Public Lands, reports certain papers the nature of which he has described, which he asks may be printed in connection with the report heretofore made on the bill the title of which he has named. If there be no objection the papers will be received as part of the report and printed in connection with it. The Chair hears no objection.

A MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 674) to authorize the purchase of additional grounds for the United States court-house and post-office building at Springfield, Ill.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 1013) for the erection of a public building at Troy, N. Y.;

A bill (H. R. 5674) for the erection of a public building at the city of Tyler, in the State of Texas; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 320) authorizing the printing of the report of the Commissioner of Education for 1883 and 1884.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. COKE introduced a bill (S. 2618) to authorize the readjustment of compensation of postmasters at certain fourth-class post-offices; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. VAN WYCK introduced a bill (S. 2619) granting a pension to Martha Hughes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2620) granting a pension to Thomas H. Boaz; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

HARBOR DEFENSES.

Mr. SEWELL. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the Senate whether any plans or preparations have been matured by the Engineer Corps of the Army or in the War Department for defending, by torpedoes or otherwise, in case of sudden war with any foreign power, the harbors on our seacoast and lakes; and if torpedo stations have been established, or are contemplated for such defense of harbors, then whether any armament has been provided or planned for the protection of such torpedo stations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MORGAN. I think the resolution had better go to the Committee on Military Affairs. The Government of the United States may have very good reasons why it does not wish to disclose the full state of preparation for the defense of the country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is not open to debate. It is not yet before the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. My motion is to refer the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is not yet before the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. I beg pardon. I shall make the motion at the proper time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Senator from Michigan will proceed.

Mr. CONGER. If there were any such plans in regard to particular harbors, any details of the designs of the Department with regard to those harbors, it would be publishing to the world what perhaps ought not to be known. As I see there is no discretion left to the Secretary of War whether the information is to be communicated if in accordance with the public interests, I think the resolution had better be referred.

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the Senator from New Jersey will proceed.

Mr. SEWELL. I have no doubt as to the propriety of this matter, but I have no objection to a reference of the resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the resolution being considered this day and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs? The Chair hears none, and it is so referred.

HOUR OF DAILY MEETING.

Mr. SHERMAN. I offer the following resolution and ask for its immediate consideration:

Resolved, That on and after Monday, February 9, the hour of meeting of the Senate shall be 11 o'clock a. m., unless otherwise ordered, and the morning hour shall expire at 1 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. I think the resolution had better lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over on objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall call it up to-morrow.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2168) for the relief of the executrix of Ayres P. Merrill.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1793) to amend section 4434 of title 52 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning commerce and navigation and the regulation of steam-vessels, with an amendment; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 7469) for the relief of Wehrle, Werk & Son; and

A bill (H. R. 3236) for the relief of Ernest H. Wardwell.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (S. R. 104) providing for the printing and distribution of the Descriptive Catalogue of Government Publications; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

RULE AS TO AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. INGALLS. Pursuant to the notice I gave yesterday, I move to amend the third paragraph of Rule XVI by striking out the words "no amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill, nor shall any," and inserting before "amendment," in line 2 of said clause, the word "no." In line 3 strike out the word "the" before "bill" and insert "any general appropriation;" and insert after the word "bill" the word "shall;" so that when amended the clause would read:

No amendment not germane nor relevant to the subject-matter contained in any general appropriation bill shall be received, &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pursuant to the notice given yesterday, the Senator from Kansas now moves to amend Rule XVI. The proposed amendment will be read.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to ask the Senator from Kansas if he has put his motion in the form of a resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a motion made by the Senator from Kansas pursuant to notice. The motion will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection to its present consideration.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the third paragraph of Rule XVI strike out the words "no amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill, nor shall any"——

Mr. INGALLS. No; that is wrong.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chief Clerk is reading the official print.

Mr. INGALLS. He is reading the rule as proposed to be amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chief Clerk is reading precisely the notice given yesterday by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. INGALLS. I understood that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] called for the reading of the rule as it would be when amended. I was mistaken.

Mr. HARRIS. I simply inquired if the Senator from Kansas had put in writing the motion he makes, a copy of which I now have in my hand. I intended to suggest to the Senator that he allow his motion to be referred to the Committee on Rules, so that we may have a meeting as early as the Senator may choose and consider it there.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chief Clerk will now read the proposed amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. Amend the third paragraph of Rule XVI as follows:

Strike out the words "no amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill, nor shall any," and insert before "amendment," in line 2 of said clause, the word "no." In line 3 strike out the word "the" before "bill," and insert "any general appropriation;" and insert after the word "bill" the word "shall;" so that when amended the clause would read:

No amendment not germane nor relevant to the subject-matter contained in any general appropriation bill shall be received, &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the motion?

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the Senator from Kansas——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The subject is not open to debate, as the motion is not yet before the Senate for consideration.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the motion of the Senator from Kansas? The Chair hears none. It is before the Senate, and the question is on agreeing to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not care now to do it, but I desire to make the motion which the Senator from Tennessee indicated, that the question be referred to the Committee on Rules. That, I think, is the proper course, because it is very difficult to discuss a question of this kind unless the appropriate committee have first considered and reported upon it. I have no doubt it would be promptly reported. I do not desire to delay the question at all, but I think the motion had better be referred to the Committee on Rules, of which I believe the Senator from Kansas himself is a member.

Mr. HALE. Could it not be reported to-morrow morning probably?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think very likely. The Senator's colleague [Mr. FRYE] is the chairman of the committee.

Mr. FRYE. The Senate will remember that this matter has been discussed heretofore by the Committee on Rules, on a revision of the rules, and that the decision was unanimous against it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know, but at the same time, during the present session, under the peculiar circumstances which surround us, it might be that a temporary rule could be agreed upon. I hope it may not become a permanent one. It is a question which might very well be considered by the Committee on Rules.

Mr. FRYE. If we once open this door we shall keep it open, I fear.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall submit a motion to refer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the motion be committed to the Committee on Rules. The question is on agreeing to the motion to refer.

Mr. HALE. The Senate finds itself confronted this year with more instances on appropriation bills sent from the other House to this body of legislation than perhaps ever before. There are bills now pending before the Senate which have been reported from the Committee on Appropriations containing very marked features of legislation—bills which must be considered by the Senate at a very early day. The pension appropriation bill among others contains legislation curing defective and what the House evidently believes, and what I believe, to be improper legislation of last year. The Senate will be met squarely with the question upon that bill to-day or to-morrow whether because of blind adherence to the present rule of the Senate it will take action against legislation which in itself is proper, is remedial, and is needed. I should hope that in view of the present condition, the stress of weather under which the Senate is acting——

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator from Maine allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HALE. Let me finish this sentence, and then I shall yield.

Mr. BECK. I was about to say——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine declines to yield.

Mr. HALE. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BECK. It was just in the line of the very sentence the Senator is uttering that I desired to say that even if we do adhere to our rule, that does not get clear of it, because the House will come into conference and demand it there. We do not get clear of it by adhering to the rule. That is the trouble. I beg the Senator's pardon for the interruption.

Mr. HALE. I was going to say that I hope, if the motion is sent to the Committee on Rules, it will have a meeting to-day or to-morrow morning and in view of the exigency will relax the stringency of the present rule of the Senate, because if we insist upon the rule and vote out all the House propositions, vote out legislation that in itself nine out of ten of the members of this body would vote for, we do not thereby, as the Senator from Kentucky says, get rid of it. The whole thing is thrown into conference, and it may well be found that the attitude of the other House is that upon proper legislation it will insist upon its amendments even if the bill be lost. Then the Senate will be found meeting the question squarely whether it will, because of this rule, utterly defy the House and declare that upon appropriation bills no sort of legislation shall be put, however wise and just. I for one upon such matters do not believe that the Senate can stand—I do not believe it will stand—when confronted with such a question as that.

Therefore, I hope if the motion goes to the Committee on Rules that it will have prompt consideration and that the rule will be relaxed.

Mr. BECK. I rise to apologize to the Senator from Maine for interrupting him in the midst of his remarks. I was thinking of the same thing and feared that he would leave out the most difficult part of the trouble, and I very improperly interrupted him before he finished his sentence.

Mr. HALE. Not at all.

Mr. BECK. But that is the trouble. We shall have before us the pension appropriation bill, which I understand will be called up to-day, or to-morrow at the furthest. Legislation has been placed on that bill by the House which we have pro forma stricken out in the Committee on Appropriations in obedience to the wishes of the Senate, but which the Committee on Appropriations knows it can not keep out, and which we do not believe it ought to keep out, unless the rules compel us to do so. Further, we do not believe the Senate will consent to have that legislation stricken out; and if the Senate does consent to strike it out the House will never yield. So something ought to be done, such as the Senator from Kansas suggests, to get us out of this dilemma, which is only the first perhaps of twenty or thirty more which we shall have before us in the next twenty days.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I do not concur with the proposition to allow the ingrafting of general legislation upon appropriation bills, and so far from desiring to see the Senate rule amended in order to permit the extension of that mode of legislation, I earnestly hope the Committee on Rules will feel themselves authorized to confer with members of the corresponding committee in the other House for the purpose of seeing whether a joint rule can not be adopted to exclude general legislation from appropriation bills.

I do not propose to repeat the reasons against ingrafting general legislation on appropriation bills, because they are very obvious. I only understand now that the House permits it, and the Senate does not, and that between the two there is an inequality of influence. The other House may submit to us appropriation bills stuffed full with general provisions and new provisions of law, whereas under our rules we can not do it. Rather than see the extension of what I think is an evil principle in legislation upon appropriation bills, I hope that the committee representing the Senate may be able to induce the House to so modify their rules that appropriation bills will not be capable of becoming the vehicles of general legislation under a joint rule of the two bodies.

Mr. FRYE. In reply to the Senator from Delaware I desire to say a word. I said that this subject had been considered by the Committee on Rules, and a proposition like this determined against when the rules were revised—determined against with instructions to send to the House a joint rule such as the Senator from Delaware suggests. That joint rule was passed through the Senate and sent to the House, and the chairman of the Committee on Rules believed himself to be instructed to do everything in his power to get the assent of the House or of the Committee on Rules of the House to that proposition. He did so. No assent has been obtained, and I desire to say to the Senator from Delaware that I do not believe it is within the range of possibility that any assent to such a rule can be obtained. The truth is that under the present rules of the House legislation is almost an impossibility unless it is had upon an appropriation bill; and so long as that condition exists they will not give up their rule, which allows them to legislate on a general appropriation bill, and I do not believe it is any use to undertake in any way to obtain a provision on the part of the House such as has been desired heretofore by the Senate, and has prevailed in the Senate. I think they will not give up the privilege which they now enjoy under their rules.

Mr. BAYARD. It is a very melancholy condition of things for the House of Representatives that they should have adopted such a set of rules that they become rather obstructive, instead of assistants to the transaction of business; and it scarcely seems to be the part of wisdom that we should cripple our own system of business which has proved itself to be convenient, and which in all reason is just and proper, simply because the House of Representatives tie their hands so that they can not legislate in a wise and rational manner.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, being a member of the Committee on Rules, perhaps I ought not to object to a reference of this resolution for the purpose of enabling them to consult thereon; but I think I do not go beyond a correct statement of this matter when I say that every member of the Senate is competent and ready at this time to act upon this question, that Senators do not need any instruction from the Committee on Rules upon the subject.

I concur heartily with the Senator from Delaware as to the vice of general legislation upon general appropriation bills; but we are confronted to-day with a very grave dilemma. We are in a predicament. We have gone into a cul de sac so far as legislation is concerned, and there is nothing for us to do but to turn around and come out again.

Mr. President, so far as the attitude of this question is concerned there can be but one view. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has stated one proposition. The pension appropriation bill is on the table of the Senate, ready to be taken up at this present time. It appropriates $60,000,000. Appended to that is certain legislation, much of which is wise and just, some of which is of questionable propriety. Under the rules of the Senate we are forbidden either to amend that or to discuss it; and the Committee on Appropriations, the Senator from Maine informs me, has, in accordance with the rules of the Senate, so reported, and that legislation is absolutely stricken out by the action of that committee, and so stands upon the House bill to-day.

It is in the power of any single member of this body, by objecting to any legislation, to obtain the ruling of the presiding officer that it is not in order under the rules, and therefore must go out. We are deprived of the opportunity of amending the legislation that comes to us from the House of Representatives. Now, I say frankly that there is some of the legislation on the pension appropriation bill that I can not afford to resist. The Senate of the United States can not afford to resist it. It is matter that is material to the interest of this Government and to the welfare of pensioners and pension claimants.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. INGALLS. With pleasure.

Mr. HALE. And is also entirely germane to the subject-matter of the appropriation bill and the laws and rules under which the Pension Department runs, as affecting hundreds of thousands of pensioners. It has all that merit.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Maine intensifies the argument that I was making on this subject. With this first clause of the rule stricken out, this legislation it would be competent for the Senate to consider.

I hope, therefore, that, inasmuch as it has become apparent that general legislation, however vicious, however undesirable it may be, can not be excluded from general appropriation bills without either a joint rule or the mutual agreement of the two Houses, we shall accept the situation and put ourselves in a position where we shall be at liberty to amend legislation that comes here from the House, to propose legislation if we see fit, and not leave ourselves in this predicament of finally being compelled to accept legislation from the House of Representatives by the report of a committee of conference, without any opportunity either for discussion or for amendment.

As I said at the outset, I do not feel at liberty to oppose the reference of this subject to the Committee on Rules, but I hope the Senate will not refer it. It is a matter that has been discussed here, so that every Senator is fully advised upon the subject. Every one knows the evil we desire to cure, and we are just exactly as able to act intelligently upon the subject now as we shall be after the Committee on Rules have reported either in favor of or against it.

Mr. MAXEY. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas, who is very much more familiar with the rules than I am, if this is not the result of the sixteenth rule, that where a measure in the nature of legislation comes from the House on an appropriation bill which we think in the right direction but defective, then we can not amend that defect here under our rules. Is not that the fact?

Mr. INGALLS. That is very true; we are deprived not only of the opportunity of presenting legislation ourselves to an appropriation bill, but we are forbidden to amend that which comes from the House of Representatives.

Mr. MAXEY. That was the point I was desiring to suggest.

Mr. INGALLS. And the practical result is, as the statutes of Congress will show for the past ten years, that notwithstanding the existence of this provision in the Senate rules, there is hardly one of your appropriation bills that does not contain general legislation that has been placed there by conference committees, to which the Senate has been ultimately compelled by the exigencies of the situation to agree.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I have thought that the reference of this matter to the Committee on Rules might result in introducing some plan of this sort. I think one great objection to the consideration of general legislation in connection with appropriation bills is that the Committee on Appropriations are often called upon to deal with entirely unfamiliar subjects. These bills come late in the session, and the investigation and labor required in looking into the items of appropriation pure and simple are sufficient to occupy the time of the Appropriations Committee. By legislative provisions in the bills they are frequently called upon to consider some general legislation affecting the Army, possibly without any representative of the Military Committee upon the Committee on Appropriations. There is no provision under the rule by which they can take the opinion of the Committee on Military Affairs as to that legislation. Now if we are to so modify our rules that general legislation coming from the House of Representatives may be considered and amended and that new general legislation germane to the bill as matters affecting the Army to the military bill and the Navy to the naval bill, we ought so to arrange our rules that those propositions should be submitted to the judgment of the appropriate committee to which the matter would go if it was introduced independently here in the Senate, so that the Appropriations Committee should have the judgment of the appropriate committee upon these matters of general legislation. It seems to me that if this measure goes to the Committee on Rules they may so amend the rules as that that result would be secured. It would undoubtedly aid the Committee on Appropriations. I have no contest with them; I do not desire in the smallest degree to depreciate them or their efforts; they are as able as any other Senators of the same number to deal with all these questions; but toward the close of a session it is an overworked committee, and unless propositions looking to general legislation can have the consideration of the appropriate committees that deal with the subjects about which legislation is to be had, we shall get careless legislation.

Therefore I think the rule ought to be so framed as that the Committee on Appropriations should be required to take the advice or submit to the judgment—not perhaps to be conclusive—but at least that they may have the benefit of the views of the particular committee having general charge of the subject and that the views of that committee might accompany their report of the appropriation bill to the Senate. If we are to open the door to this legislation—and it seems to me we must do so, for I have no hope at all that the House will ever be induced to adopt a joint rule by which they surrender the right to put general legislation on an appropriation bill—it should be in this way. It is absurd that the one body should be free in this direction and the other should be absolutely tied up by its rules. If we can not come to the common ground of excluding it altogether, then there is nothing to do but to accept the situation upon this subject. But when that is done I should hope the rule might be so framed that legislation would go to the committee that is familiar with the particular subject upon which legislation is asked.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, this is an old and controverted subject. I think if there is to be a remedy applied it must be a radical remedy. I am perfectly willing, in view of the present condition of the business of the Senate, to vote for a provision modifying the sixteenth rule so as to allow any legislative amendments germane or relevant in their character to be offered to appropriation bills during the present session; but I want it distinctly understood that if the House are to adopt a rule that will force us to consider general legislation on appropriation bills, then I am in favor at the next session of Congress of reversing the whole theory of our rules and referring every general appropriation bill to the appropriate committee having charge of the subject to which the bill relates. There is no other way.

I have had long experience on the subject. At one time as a member of the House of Representatives, when chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, I entered into a contest with the Senate on the subject. The result then was that the Senate and House agreed upon a series of joint rules by which the business was conducted. Those joint rules now have ceased to exist and are of no force. But it is absolutely certain that if the House sends legislation on appropriation bills of the most important character affecting every branch of the public service, unless we want to resolve ourselves into a committee of one upon all subjects of legislation, and to have a single committee to deal with all these multiplied questions, we must send the appropriation bills to their appropriate committees. In that event the appropriation bill for the support of the Army should go to the Military Committee, for the Navy to the Naval Committee, for the Patent Office to the Patent Committee, for pensions to the Pension Committee, and so of all the different branches of the public service because these committees are informed upon these various branches.

At the present session I believe it is now absolutely necessary to relax the rigor of the sixteenth rule in order to deal with these questions. I know one thing: Rule or no rule, I will vote for some of the legislative provisions proposed by the House of Representatives, but they are legislative provisions to correct legislation upon appropriation bills by committees of conference, or by the action of one or the other House without full consideration.

My tendency is to adopt the general change demanded by the House of Representatives so that each bill may stand upon its own bottom. Meantime I think it is necessary to consider this subject in committee, because it is necessary for us to provide some modification of the rules for the present session. I believe that can be done better by five or six gentlemen sitting around a committee table than in the Senate Chamber; but if it should not be deemed necessary to refer it, I shall offer as a substitute for the proposition of the Senator from Kansas, which he will probably agree to, that for the present session the sixteenth rule be so modified that amendments proposing general legislation germane and relevant to the subject-matter contained in any general appropriation bill may be received, confining it to the present session.

Mr. INGALLS. That is entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator from Ohio whether it would not be better that general legislation proposed here should have the sanction of some committee, rather than to open the entire subject?

Mr. SHERMAN. The rule already requires that no amendment of any kind to an appropriation bill enlarging the scope of it can be offered except by direction of a committee of the body. That is already in the rules.

Mr. FRYE. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to this rule. I understand the position of the Senate heretofore to have been that there shall be no general legislation on an appropriation bill. The House rule is that any amendment germane and relevant and decreasing the expenditures shall be received. The Senate has been opposed to even that proposition, limited in that way that it shall decrease expenditures; but yet the Senator from Kansas proposes to pass an amendment which shall make in order any amendment germane and relevant, whether it decreases or increases expenditures. In other words, the Senator from Kansas proposes that the Senate shall go beyond the House notwithstanding the complaint which has been made of the House.

No amendment not germane nor relevant to the subject-matter contained in any general appropriation bill shall be received.

Mr. INGALLS. Read the rest of the rule. Do not stop there.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to ask the Senator from Maine if he will yield to me?

Mr. FRYE. I do.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask if he can conceive of any subject-matter of legislation that would not be germane and relevant to some one or other of the appropriation bills that we annually pass; and if that be true, had we not quite as well or even better abolish our rule altogether than make the modification that is proposed? I am opposed to the modification, and I am opposed to abolishing the rule.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, whether this proposition shall be referred to the Committee on Rules or not is a matter of indifference to me. I am opposed to the proposition, whether we are to act upon it now or, with my present light, whether it comes here by the report of the Committee on Rules; and I am opposed to the modification of this rule for the present session even. There is a familiar quotation that it is better to Bear those ills we have

Than fly to others that we know not of.

And while it is true that we are in a predicament, we are proposing in order to escape that predicament not exactly to fly to evils that we know not of, but to evils that we are perfectly acquainted with.

This rule has been adopted by the Senate and adhered to for a long period of years, because it was the deliberate conviction of the Senate that legislation upon appropriation bills was fraught with great danger, and the danger is just as great at this session and will be just as great at a succeeding session as it ever has been.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator allow me to inquire right there if our adhesion to the rule has prevented general legislation on appropriation bills?

Mr. PLATT. To a certain extent it has, but not entirely. But for one I prefer as a Senator to stand in the attitude of rejecting all general legislation upon appropriation bills and placing the responsibility for such legislation where it belongs, rather than to open the doors to what it seems to me will be a very bad and very dangerous practice.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, I want to suggest an amendment which I presume is not in order, but I submit it to enable me to present my views to the Senate on this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks that there be read an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the resolution. It will be read for information, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read the proposed amendment, as follows:

Nor shall any amendment which proposes general legislation be put on any appropriation bill unless proposed by the proper standing committee of the Senate, nor except on a vote of two-thirds of the Senators voting, said vote to be taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. PLUMB. I think it would be unwise to break down this rule entirely even for this session. It is just as competent for the Senate to meet this emergency now as it will be next year. It has grown to the proportions of a very great evil. But we are still confronted with one fact, and that is that the House will make its own rules and that they are just as competent and just as much authorized to pass upon the question of public policy involved as the Senate, and it ought to be understood as a matter due not only to the Senate but to the House also that indirectly we can accomplish nothing. The fair, the frank, the manly way to arrive at a conclusion on this subject which shall be mutually profitable and just is to propose to the House what we think ought to be the common rule of both Houses; but it is not fair for the Senate to insist that the Appropriations Committee, nor is it fair that the Appropriations Committee shall itself by indirection seek to coerce the House. We shall in that way neither gain in our own temper nor in that of the House, nor shall we gain in anything which concerns the public good or welfare. If we believe that here is a practice which has grown up which ought not to be, which is subversive of the good of legislation, we ought to say so to the House frankly and ask them to confer with us on that subject in order that a common conclusion may be arrived at which shall meet the case. As it is now we stand in the attitude when our virtue is at high-water mark of rejecting all legislation on appropriation bills and thereby seeking to do by indirection what we lack the courage apparently to do by direction, and then one extreme following the other, as it always does, we yield entirely and take everything that the other House sends, with or without amendment, according as the temper is at the time.

We are nearly at the close of a session. We are confronted by a very serious problem on the pension appropriation bill now on the Senate table. Numbers of Senators feel about this matter as my colleague has expressed himself—that is to say, that there are provisions on that bill which he himself is not willing to take the responsibility as a legislator here of rejecting in toto; and that results in the position in which the House may put itself; its members say "we are not willing to omit the opportunity which our rules afford us" of doing the very thing which my colleague says he is not willing to omit the opportunity to do himself, that opportunity being presented. That only illustrates the difficulties which attend the situation all the way through. There may be emergencies occurring at any time at the close of a session when the ability to put legislation upon an appropriation bill, the objection of one member to the contrary notwithstanding, may be of the most vital character. Instead, therefore, of tying our hands even at this late hour of the session, or opening the door too wide, we ought, I think, to do the conservative thing and reserve the right of the Senate under proper discrimination, and after discussion, and when the Senate is full—that is to say, when a quorum is present and voting—then only of doing what may be an emergent thing. Therefore I suggest if the proposed rule is to be voted upon now, that it should be amended so that only under two conditions will the Senate consent to even amend any legislation that may be sent here on appropriation bills by the House. One is that the amendment shall be reported by the proper standing committee of the Senate; and the second is that there shall be two-thirds of the Senators present forming a quorum voting for that upon the yeas and nays, thereby expressing in an affirmative manner their conviction of the necessity or the urgency of the proposed legislation.

That much at least I think is due to the dignity of men sitting to legislate for the country; that much is due to the position of the body as a conservative branch of the Government, and yet, while conservative, not willing to put itself in the attitude of being obstructive.

I speak of this question as a member of the Appropriations Committee, with the embarrassments which surround the case in that committee, and the feeling on the part of the committee that it is not our function originally to pass on these questions, and with the further feeling that the Senate itself ought not by indirect means to seek to ask the House to abandon its rule under which it is proceeding; and as there is now time for a conference with the House on the subject, and as something apparently ought to be done, though I am willing for one to strike out all legislation from these bills, yet as there is an apparent necessity for doing something in a certain direction in the way of legislation that can only be accomplished in this method, and as the House has tendered us some important propositions and will tender us more—because I have a bill on my table, the Post-Office appropriation bill, full of legislation, some of which is good undeniably, some of which is vicious undeniably; and therefore, as I said, we ought to be able to meet it, but while meeting it we ought not as a rule to throw down the bars entirely and open wide the door in such a way that there may be a carnival of unwise and ill-digested legislation put on appropriation bills in the expiring hours of the session when from the very necessity of the case, as we know by past experience, there will be sometimes not a quorum nor half a quorum in attendance on the deliberations of this body.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, the Senate misses on this occasion the orators who instructed and stimulated it to a valiant maintenance of its rules when the pension appropriation bill was brought in from the other branch. The difficulty and the defect in our rule was pointed out at that time, and the dilemma in which it placed the Senate was presented. Nevertheless we were told then that it was the duty of the Senate to maintain our rule to the letter, let the consequences be what they might; and we were told by Senators of great experience and ability and long service in this body that they would stand by this rule, let the consequence be an extra session of Congress if the Senate maintained what was framed in wisdom and was necessary for the maintenance of free, unbiased deliberation upon appropriation bills. We were told then that the only cowards in this body in respect to it were the Appropriations Committee, that they would come in and in the last moments would surrender to the other branch and take legislation on appropriation bills. It did not matter that Senators were reminded on that occasion of the urgency, when the last days of a session approached, the absolute necessity that the appropriation bills should be adopted, and that that necessity would, in spite of our then valor, carry through this body legislation just precisely as it was brought to us. I am amazed now that since the Appropriations Committee, stimulated in their duty as they were by that debate, have presented the question here, the self-same orators who taught us our duty so plainly and so clearly at that time as to make us surrender all doubt and misgiving on our own part, are now either silent or are the first to surrender our rule in toto.

It was supposed by those Senators, and they were right, that legislation in appropriation bills was an evil, an evil that ought to be remedied, not surrendered to. We are inviting it by this debate to-day. We are calling upon ourselves to consider in appropriation bills the legislation of the country, and you are imposing upon your Appropriations Committee, in the last days of the session, not only that which hitherto has been considered enough for them to do, to consider what are proper appropriations, but to take up also the duty of the Pensions Committee, the duty of the Committee on Indian Affairs, of the Committee on Military Affairs, of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and more than all that, that most important of all committees, if I may make a comparison, the Judiciary Committee, all are by this debate surrendered to the Appropriations Committee, and they can not take up those matters till within three weeks of the end of the session.

There comes along in one bill private claims enough in a single appropriation bill to occupy the Committee on Claims half this session, and the committee having it in charge, the Appropriations Committee, who have supposed hitherto that it was quite enough for them to do to ascertain and recommend to the Senate what were proper appropriations, are called upon to examine into or take unexamined private claims enough in a single appropriation bill to occupy any committee, who would ascertain thoroughly the merits of those claims, the whole of the next three weeks.

Where is the determination of the Senate a few weeks ago to uphold the rule? Where are those who told us they would stand here in support of the rule till an extra session of Congress, if need be, were upon us? The rule, in my opinion, was a wise one as it was framed. If there is any defect in it at all it is in a misconstruction of the rule some time ago, which has since grown into a precedent which ought to be modified, much like the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], though he will pardon me for saying that the quarter from which it comes is the one I least expected to see it from.

Mr. President, if you adopt the amendment suggested by the Senator from Ohio you impose at once upon the Appropriations Committee a duty they can not perform. To look to the appropriations proper, and nothing else, is more than they can properly do in the next eighteen days; but in those bills from the necessity of the exigencies in the other branch is all the legislation of the session in the other branch. I understand the difficulties of the case. I understand that one branch has just the same power and the same right to determine its rules as the other, and that we have no more right to say what shall be the rules of the other branch than the other branch has a right to say what shall be our rules. The only way to meet the case is to find some possible common rule, and if it be a common rule like that which is suggested by the amendment of the Senator from Ohio to the proposition of the Senator from Kansas, then distribute the appropriation bills, discharge your Appropriations Committee from the consideration of the legislation in those bills, divide this work, or have it brought in here crude and unconsidered, and mature it here in the Senate Chamber in the last few days of the session.

Let us meet this question as it is, not undertake to meet the difficulty coming from the other branch by a counter difficulty here overwhelming them, running a race with them, competing with them to see which will get the most legislation in an appropriation bill. Legislation in an appropriation bill is an evil, an alarming evil, a dangerous evil, and it ought to be stopped in some way or other, not invited, not increased, not aggravated as we are proposing to do to-day.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I think this amendment to the rules is one of the most dangerous propositions ever addressed to the Senate if its logic be acted upon in the future conduct of our relations with the other branch. I wish the Senate for a moment to consider to what this is to lead.

When the Constitution was adopted the power was given to the House of Representatives, as the great constitutional equivalent for the equality of the States in the Senate, to originate money bills. The House has insisted that the true interpretation of that constitutional provision authorizes the House exclusively to originate appropriation bills; and it was determined when that question arose, upon the declaration of Mr. Webster, that the House must from the necessity of the case be the final judge of the meaning and extent of that constitutional provision; so that practically I am correct in saying that the power was given to the House by the Constitution exclusively to originate appropriation bills.

I will not undertake to proceed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will please resume their seats. Business will be suspended until Senators take their seats and cease conversation [rapping with his gavel].

The Senator from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. HOAR. I do not care about proceeding.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I desire to say a word or two with reference to this general subject, which is not a new one, as the Senator from Ohio has said. I think any proposition looking to general legislation on appropriation bills is a dangerous one. In the nature of things the appropriation bills, whether at the long or the short session, are delayed until nearly the last moments of the session. At the session ending in July last the important appropriation bills did not reach the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate until in May and June. It is true they were full of legislation at that time. The committee, under the instructions of the Senate, eliminated from the bills all legislation. Afterwards, in the committees of conference, a portion of that legislation was yielded to in order to secure an agreement to the passage of the bills.

But what was dangerous then is more dangerous now, and is always especially so at a short session. If we are to open these bills to legislation, necessarily there will be legislation put upon them that is not well considered; and therefore, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, I should be glad to see the Senate stand rigorously in favor of its present rule against all legislation on appropriation bills, and against consenting to legislation put on by the House of Representatives; but I know the Senator from Kansas will say in response that the end is legislation that the House insists upon, or a failure of the appropriation bills.

Mr. INGALLS. By the action of the committees of conference—and I say that without any invidious allusion at all—that is the practical operation, that without amendment or discussion the legislation proposed by the House of Representatives is agreed to finally by committees of conference.

Mr. ALLISON. More or less of that legislation is thus agreed to, and I admit that is vicious; but we are confronted always at the end with the fact that we must make some compromise on these bills or else the bills will fail.

Now, I hope this resolution of the Senator from Kansas to amend the rules will be referred to the Committee on Rules, and I hope he will consent to that, and that that committee, if they see proper to open this door at all, will open it in a way to permit the least possible legislation on appropriation bills. I would be glad myself to have it confined to amendments of legislation that we find on the bills when they come to us from the House. If that will not do, then all legislation proposed here on appropriation bills should be proposed by a standing committee of the Senate, because, in the nature of things, the Committee on Appropriations can not consider such legislation.

Take for illustration the legislation on the pension appropriation bill. It affects all the questions relating to pension attorneys and other matters of importance. The Committee on Appropriations, in the nature of things, can not examine these questions in the short time allowed them. Yet we were compelled on the pension appropriation bill at this session to examine in detail, so far as we could, all the legislation found upon the bill as it came from the House of Representatives. If the Senate will adhere to its rule that all legislation shall be struck from appropriation bills and insist upon that, then we can within a reasonable time, and possibly at this session, eliminate every matter of legislation from these bills; but if we yield to the House of Representatives and ourselves put on legislation, the effect will be that there will be a race, as the Senator from Massachusetts says, between the two Houses with reference to legislation, and then not only the legislation of the House will be found upon these bills, but counter legislation from the Senate, and committees of conference will in the end be compelled to decide great questions of legislation in conference that have not been considered in the House or that have not been considered in the Senate.

The question is not without difficulty. The Committee on Appropriations do not desire power to be given them with regard to legislation upon appropriation bills. I should be glad—and I think I express the sentiment of the committee when I say we prefer that there should be no legislation upon these bills at any time submitted to the Committee on Appropriations. We prefer that questions of legislation should go to the proper committees whose duty it is to consider the respective subjects.

Take the legislation that is proposed in the Post-Office appropriation bill for the next year that has not yet reached the Senate. It runs over the entire range of the Post-Office establishment; it involves the rates of postage; it involves the entire contract system; it involves grave questions of legislation that ought to be considered by the Post-Office Committee, by the Committee on the Judiciary, and by other committees of this body. Surely the Committee on Appropriations can not consider those questions, and I do not see how they can be referred, as the Senator from Ohio suggests, to their appropriate committees. Take the Post-Office appropriation bill for illustration, containing the legislation to which I have alluded. A part of it should go to the Committee on the Judiciary, a part of it to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and a part of it elsewhere perhaps. And so with every regular appropriation bill that comes before the Senate. Take the sundry civil bill as an illustration. A part of it should go to the Naval Committee, a part of it to the Committee on Military Affairs, a part of it to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, a part of it to the Committee on Patents, and so on. The sundry civil bill would be referred to a dozen different committees of this body on that idea. So of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. That is an impracticable thing. Therefore I shall be glad if the Senate will adhere as rigidly as it can adhere to the rule that there shall be no legislation upon appropriation bills, and let the Appropriations Committee be confined in its jurisdiction and authority to recommending the appropriations of public money as provided by law, and leave to every other committee of this body its proper jurisdiction to recommend the change of existing laws and such general legislation as it may think proper; and unless that is done legislation in this body will be hasty legislation.

The Senator from Ohio very truthfully says that we come in here with the reports of committees of conference and then hasty legislation is the consequence. That is true, and I will go with him in every instance where a conference committee or the Committee on Appropriations have made mistakes to correct those mistakes on the appropriation bills notwithstanding the rule; but my judgment is that we shall only increase the difficulty if we open this door to legislation in any way through the Senate of the United States. We shall only create an opportunity for more hasty legislation with reference to all the subjects that will come before the Senate on the appropriation bills, because there are a great many subjects of legislation that are germane to these bills and can properly be introduced here if the rule suggested by the Senator from Kansas is adopted as he now proposes it. I trust he will consent that this proposition of his and the other propositions suggested in connection with it may be referred to the Committee on Rules. If this door is to be opened at all let it be opened in the narrowest possible way. I will say to him that if he will consent to that I shall not call up the pension appropriation bill until the Committee on Rules shall have had an opportunity of acting upon this question.

Mr. HAWLEY. I agree very heartily with the Senator from Iowa. This is not a new question in these Halls; it is not a new question in the legislative bodies of the several States; it is not a new question in the British houses of Parliament. Six years ago we had a four months' extra session of Congress caused by differences between the two Houses arising substantially on this practice. To send us legislation upon appropriation bills is practically to nullify this body, practically to make it an absolute nullity in the business of the country. It is not a question of personal pride or preference on our part; it is our constitutional duty to stand by our rights in this matter. The appropriation bills are absolutely necessary to the existence of the Government. What discretion then is left us as legislators when the most important legislation is placed upon those bills? We are virtually told by the very presentation of it here from the other House that we must yield to their views in certain matters, whether they be our views or not; otherwise the Government is pro hâc vice, as the lawyers would say, sacrificed.

I hope the Senate will stand by the old rule, and what I consider to be not merely a preference or a convenience in business, but a constitutional right.

Allow me a moment more. Three-quarters of the States forbid this practice. I think nearly every one of the original constitutions adopted within fifteen years, and the amended constitutions adopted within that time, forbid this practice. Essentially it was forbidden in some of the original constitutions adopted one hundred years ago. If I recollect aright, the constitution of the State of Maryland from the beginning forbade it. In 1708 it was declared in the British Parliament that the practice was subversive of the constitution, and that put an end to it there, for there the house of commons alone can originate supply bills, and after a fierce controversy they came to the conclusion that the practice was, as it is here, subversive of the constitution.

There is only one true final settlement of this whole series of questions, and that is to put into the Constitution of the United States three propositions, in substance as they are now in the constitutions of several States, namely: First, that each bill shall refer to but one subject, and that shall be clearly indicated in the title; next, that there shall be no general legislation upon appropriation bills; and thirdly, that the President may veto any item upon an appropriation bill, approving the remainder. These three amendments to the Constitution of the United States will settle a question that is dangerous to the present purposes and organization of the Government.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, this is a practical and not a theoretical question. Theoretically, legislation on appropriation bills is vicious. I think there can be no question of that. But Congress is composed of two Houses; each House is coequal with the other, each House makes its own rules and regulations. The House of Representatives has certain rules. Under them it can place legislation upon appropriation bills. The Senate has a rule, its own rule, a legal rule, which prohibits the Senate from either amending that legislation or ingrafting any new legislation upon an appropriation bill. Then we are left in the condition under our rule of being utterly helpless and powerless to do anything in regard to the proposed legislation of the House except to strike it out. The House non-concurs in the amendment of the Senate striking out the legislation. It is forced into a conference committee. Then the question is, what will the Senate do? There has never yet been a time since I have been here, so far as I know, when the Senate would have stood upon that proposition, and forced an extra session of Congress or the continuance indefinitely of the session then near its close. There is the practical question.

The very necessity for legislation upon the pension appropriation bill now pending lying upon the table of the Senate grows out of the fact that we at the last session struck out the House legislation, refused to amend or have anything to do with it, and then when the bill went into conference legislation slipped in which a great many Senators did not understand.

Mr. HALE. And which had not been considered by either House.

Mr. COCKRELL. And which had not, as the Senator from Maine says, been considered by the Senate or the House, and was a surprise to a large number of people. I do not know whether it is true or not, but some paper published in this city has stated that a distinguished attorney of this city got $2,500 for his services as attorney in procuring that amendment, and another distinguished attorney got a thousand dollars for his services as attorney in securing the passage of that legislation. Testimony to that effect is said to have been taken before a committee of the other branch of Congress, the attorney himself, who was interested in the legislation, having stated that he made these payments.

Mr. LAPHAM. He stated further that both of those sums were made contingent upon the success of the legislation.

Mr. COCKRELL. Both made contingent, as the Senator from New York says, upon securing the kind of legislation that was desired, and it having been secured the money was paid.

Now, Mr. President, it is a practical question, what shall we do? Shall we continue to tie our hands and remain supinely upon our backs, do nothing, strike out all legislation, and then leave a conference committee to modify it, and finally have such legislation enacted as neither the Senate nor the House knows anything about?

Mr. HAWLEY. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. If this legislation, obtained in the manner he has said, is so exceedingly vicious, if there be such a desire to repeal it, why would not a bill repealing it pass the Senate in half an hour, and why should not the House unanimously consent to the passage of such a bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. The bill, I understand, is already reported and has been for some time from the Committee on Pensions, and is now on the Senate Calendar.

Mr. HAWLEY. There is no doubt that the Senate would pass it, I suppose.

Mr. COCKRELL. No doubt about that. Why has it not been done?

Mr. HAWLEY. I am not on that committee. I do not know.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am not on that committee, nor am I of the majority of the Senate that controls and regulates the business of the Senate. The Senator is.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. COCKRELL. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Missouri will remember that a bill was introduced here some time ago on that very subject, and has been reported favorably by the Committee on Pensions, and is in the hands of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON] to report.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand that it is already reported, and is upon the Calendar.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

Mr. COCKRELL. And subject to the disposition of the Senate. I am not saying that anybody is specially to blame, but the Senator rather intimated by his question that some of us ought to have had that legislation passed.

Mr. ALLISON. No.

Mr. COCKRELL. I was simply, gently, and kindly informing him of a fact that he was well aware of.

Mr. ALLISON. I know how "child-like and bland" the Senator from Missouri is, but I do not think where a non-partisan matter is in the hands of a committee of this body and its conduct is committed to a member of the body, that it is quite fair to charge that upon the party majority.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no dereliction about it. There are hundreds of other as important bills on the Calendar of the Senate, reported by Democrats and Republicans, that have not yet been considered.

Mr. President, what shall we do? It is a practical question.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether or not it was also a joke that a majority of the Senate were of an opposite party to him, and that they, therefore, were responsible for the legislation when the Senate sent some two hundred bills over to the House, and under the rules of the House they went to the Speaker's table, and there was no going to the Speaker's table by the House for over five months' time and no reference of a single bill which was sent by the Senate——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine is not in order in referring to what the House of Representatives has or has not done within its own Hall.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, the people elect their Representatives and their Representatives are responsible to the people, and I shall not arraign them here. Let them answer to their constituents, their masters.

Mr. DAWES. I want to remind the Senator what the Senator from Maine was cut off from reminding him of, that the very legislation he is alluding to has received the sanction of a body containing three hundred and twenty-five members, four to one, already.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is not the question that we are now discussing. It is, what shall we do in regard to legislation upon appropriation bills? It seems to me perfectly plain that there is but one plan that will secure success, and that is for the Senate to direct its Committee on Rules or appoint a select committee to confer with the House, and, if possible, agree upon a joint rule in regard to these matters. We had joint rules for a long time; they have been set aside; we have no joint rules now. There has been no determined effort either on the part of the House or on the part of the Senate to have joint rules adopted, so far as I know.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. This Senate sent a whole code of joint rules to the House of Representatives immediately on reporting the revision of the rules, and with the same report, and they have been in the House of Representatives now for a year and a half.

Mr. COCKRELL. Still I think that action ought to be taken in regard to that. If we are to take a stand that means anything we ought to make our position impregnable, and that is by having another conference on that question; and then if we can not agree upon joint rules with the House, we ought to do one of two things as sensible, practical business men: we ought either to adopt a rule which will permit us to amend the legislation of the House in matters germane to that legislation, or we ought to say that we will strike it out and never will agree to any appropriation bill with legislation upon it, and then let session after session be continued if necessary in our refusal. There are only two practical courses that I see. I for one in our present emergency am in favor of the Senate exercising the power to amend the legislation of the House in a manner germane to that legislation. I think it is the only practicable, sensible plan for us to pursue now.

Mr. JACKSON. I ask consent of the Senate at this time to call up Senate bill 2511.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask the Senator to yield one moment while I may have final disposition made of the subject before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill (H. R. 4976) for the retirement and recoinage of the trade-dollar; pending which the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON] asks unanimous consent that the Senate now consider Order of Business 984, being the bill (S. 2511) relating to claim agents and attorneys in pension cases.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask the Senator from Tennessee to yield to me for a motion to dispose of the subject pending when 2 o'clock arrived.

Mr. JACKSON. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas is entitled to the floor.

Mr. INGALLS. I wish to make a single observation only.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator from Kansas proceeding on the motion offered by him? The Chair hears none.

Mr. INGALLS. I wish to make a single observation about a remark which fell from the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], which appeared to me to show the necessity of some action in the direction indicated by my resolution. He states that the pending legislation in the bill making appropriations for the payment of pensions is due to the fact that certain vicious and pernicious legislation was introduced into the pension appropriation bill passed last year. He states that the legislation was not considered in either House. It must, therefore, have been admitted to the appropriation bill by the action of the conferees of the two Houses, and the Senator says that for the purpose of procuring that legislation one eminent attorney was paid $2,500 and one other attorney less eminent was paid $1,000. What inference is to be drawn from that of course I am not able to say; but it shows the importance of having some discussion upon matters of this magnitude in one House of Congress or the other.

As there have been several propositions looking toward the amendment or modification of this rule, and, in the expectation that the Committee on Rules will be able to report before the pension appropriation bill is called up by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I will suggest that this subject be referred to the Committee on Rules—that that resolution and all the amendments be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CALL. I think this matter had better go over until to-morrow. ["No!" "No!"]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida object?

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator from Florida will not object.

Mr. CALL. I will not object, but I desire to say something on the subject.

Mr. ALLISON. That can be done when the Committee on Rules reports.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to this motion with all the suggested amendments being referred to the Committee on Rules? The Chair hears none, and the reference is ordered. The Chair now recognizes the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President——

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from Tennessee yield a minute until I can make a correction?

Mr. JACKSON. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Missouri to ask a question.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wanted to ask a question of the Senator from Kansas, why he made the statement that I had said so and so in regard to the payment of money? I know he did not intend to leave that impression, but he said that I stated that money had been used. I stated that it was reported and published in the papers of the city, purporting to have been testimony taken before a committee of the House, that a certain party had paid $2,500 to a distinguished attorney and a thousand dollars to another distinguished attorney—I did not make any distinction between their eminence, because they are both very distinguished gentlemen. In doing that I simply stated what I saw in the papers without any intention of reflecting at all upon the conference members of either the Senate or House.

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly, I did not understand the Senator to reflect on them.

Mr. COCKRELL. Because I do not think that there was any ill purpose whatever on the part of the conference committees of either the Senate or House. I think they did just exactly what they thought was best, and they were justifiable in doing it under the advice and recommendations which they had at the time.

FEES IN PENSION CASES.

Mr. JACKSON. I renew the motion to suspend the pending order and take up Senate bill No. 2511.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 984, being the bill (S. 2511) relating to claim agents and attorneys in pension cases.

Mr. MORRILL. I take it——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. MORRILL. I wish to ask a question of the Chair—whether that will supersede the regular unfinished business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will if it is agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I hope——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope it will not be acceded to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee. [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it.

Mr. MORRILL called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Can we not get out of this difficulty?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to be heard on this question. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I was going to inquire if we could not get out of this difficulty by agreeing unanimously that the silver bill may be informally laid aside.

Mr. MORRILL. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would state that always under such circumstances a presiding officer would recognize the gentleman in charge of the unfinished business to move it again.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. As soon as this is disposed of, undoubtedly the silver bill will come up.

Mr. MORRILL. Under those circumstances I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks that the vote ordering the yeas and nays be reconsidered and the call withdrawn. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to object, if I can, to the withdrawal of the call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire objects to the call for the yeas and nays being withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Vermont to reconsider the vote of the Senate ordering the yeas and nays.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont now withdraws the call for the yeas and nays. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON].

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2511) relating to claim agents and attorneys in pension cases.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. PALMER. In pursuance to the notice I gave on Wednesday, I ask of the Senate unanimous consent to take up Order of Business 436, being the joint resolution (S. R. 19) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, for the purpose of submitting a few remarks and not for final action.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the Senate take up for consideration, with a view to his submitting remarks upon it only, Order of Business 436, being Senate joint resolution No. 19, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. PALMER. I now give way to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

MAJ. WILLIAM LUDLOW.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 309) extending the permission granted Maj. William Ludlow by the act of February 28, 1883, to accept a civil position, to report it without amendment; and I ask for its immediate passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to report at this time a joint resolution, and he asks unanimous consent that the joint resolution be now considered.

Mr. INGALLS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Can I say a word?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PALMER. I call for the reading of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution (S. R. 19) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which, when ratified by three-fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of said Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE —.

SECTION 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex.

SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power, by appropriate legislation, to enforce the provisions of this article.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, this resolution involves the consideration of the broadest step in the progress of the struggle for human liberty that has ever been submitted to any ruler or to any legislative body. Its taking is pregnant with wide changes in the pathway of future civilization. Its obstruction will delay and cripple our advancement. The trinity of principles which Lord Chatham called the "Bible of the English constitution," namely, the Magna Charta, the Petition of Rights, and the Bill of Rights, are towering landmarks in the history of our race, but they immediately concerned but few at the time of their erection.

The Declaration of Independence by the colonists, and its successful assertion, the establishment of the right of petition, the abolition of imprisonment for debt and the property qualification for suffrage in nearly all the States, and the recognition of the right of women to earn, hold, enjoy, and devise property are proud and notable gains.

The emancipation of 4,000,000 slaves and the subsequent extension of suffrage to the male adults among them were measures enlarging the possibilities of freedom, the full benefits of which have yet to be realized; but, sir, the political emancipation of 26,000,000 of our citizens, equal to us in most essential respects and superior to us in many, seems to me to translate our nation, almost at a bound, to the broad plateau of universal equality and co-operation to which all these blood-stained and prayer-worn steps have surely led.

RISE AND PROGRESS OF THE MOVEMENT.

The time which I may occupy in advocacy of this measure will not admit of even a cursory review of the history and progress of the movement whose ultimate is before us.

Like life insurance and the man who carried the first umbrella, its inception was greeted with derision. Born of an apparently hopeless revolt against unjust discrimination, unequal statutes, and cruel constructions of courts, it has pressed on and over ridicule, malice, indifference, and conservatism, until it stands in the gray dawn before the most powerful legislative body on earth and challenges final consideration.

In its progress it has benefited all and injured none. It has created a public sentiment before which Legislatures have bent and courts have bowed.

The laws which degraded our wives have been everywhere repealed or modified, and our children may now be born of free women.

Our sisters have been recognized as having brains as well as hearts, and as capable of transacting their own business affairs.

New avenues of self-support have been found and profitably entered upon, and the doors of our colleges have ceased to creak their dismay at the approach of women.

Twelve States have extended limited suffrage through their Legislatures, and three Territories admit all citizens of suitable age to the ballot-box, while from no single locality in which it has been tried comes any word but that of satisfaction concerning the experiment.

The spirit of inquiry attendant upon the agitation and discussion of this question has permeated every neighborhood in the land, and none can be so blind as to miss the universal development in self-respect, self-reliance, general intelligence, and increased capacity among our women. They have lost none of the womanly graces, but by fitting themselves for counselors and mental companions have benefited man, more perhaps than themselves.

OBJECTIONS CONSIDERED.

In considering the objections to this extension of the suffrage we are fortunate in finding them grouped in the adverse report of the minority of your committee, and also in confidently assuming from the acknowledged ability and evident earnestness of the distinguished Senators who prepared it that all is contained therein in the way of argument or protest which is left to the opponents of this reform after thirty-seven years of discussion.

I wish that every Senator would examine this report and note how many of its reasonings are self-refuting and how few even seem to warrant further antagonism.

They cite the physical superiority of man, but offer no amendment to increase the voting power of a Sullivan or to disfranchise the halt, the lame, the blind, or the sick.

They regard the manly head of the family as its only proper representative, but would not exclude the adult bachelor sons.

They urge disability to perform military service as fatal to full citizenship, but would hardly consent to resign their own rights because they have passed the age of conscription, or question those of Quakers, who will not fight, or of professional men and civic officials who, like mothers, are regarded as of more use to the state at home.

They are dismayed by a vision of women in attendance at caucuses at late hours of the night, but doubtless enjoy their presence at routs and entertainments until the early dawn. They deprecate the appearance of women at political meetings; but, in Michigan, women have attended such meetings for years upon the earnest solicitation of those in charge, and the influence of their presence has been for good. Eloquent women are employed by State committees of all parties to canvass in their interests and are highly valued and respected.

They object, for their own States, to the addition of their former bondswomen because of their ignorance; but that risk was taken at greater hazard upon the adoption of the fifteenth amendment; and I hardly think the gentlemen would care to acknowledge their inability to provide that control for women which they appear to have obtained over the men.

They object that many women do not desire the suffrage and that some would not exercise it. It is probably true, as often claimed, that many slaves did not desire emancipation in 1863, and there are men in most communities who do not vote, but we hear of no freedman to-day who asks re-enslavement and no proposition is offered to disfranchise all men because some neglect their duty.

The minority profess a willingness to have this measure considered as a local issue rather than a national one, but those who recall the failures to extend the ballot to black men, in the most liberal Northern States, by a popular vote, may be excused if they question their frankness in suggesting this transfer of responsibility.

The education of the people of a whole State on this particular question is a much more laborious and expensive work than an appeal to the several Legislatures. The subject would be much more likely to receive intelligent treatment at the hands of the picked men of a State, where calm discussion may be had, than at the polls where prejudice and tradition oftentimes exert a more potent influence than logic and justice.

To deny this method to the women of this country is to discriminate against them invidiously.

A whole race, distinct from us, was enfranchised in this way, after repeated attempts at securing popular approval from the voters had failed, and to refuse it to those to whom we are bound by the dearest ties betrays an indifference to their requests, or an inexplicable adhesion to prejudice, which is only sought to be defended by an asserted regard for women, which to me seems most illogical.

I share no fears of the degradation of women by the ballot. I believe rather that it will elevate men. I believe the tone of our politics will be higher; that our caucuses will be jealously guarded, and our conventions more orderly and decorous. I believe the polls will be freed from the vulgarity and coarseness which now too often surround them, and that the polling booths, instead of being in the least attractive parts of a ward or town, will be in the most attractive; instead of being in stables, will be in parlors. I believe the character of candidates will be more closely scrutinized and that better officers will be chosen to make and administer the laws. I believe that the casting of the ballot will be invested with a seriousness—I had almost said a sanctity—second only to a religious observance.

THE MISUSE OF THE BIBLE.

The objections enumerated above appear to be the only profferings against this measure excepting certain fragmentary quotations and deductions from the sacred Scriptures; and here, Mr. President, I desire to enter my most solemn protest.

The opinions of Paul and Peter as to what was the best policy for the struggling churches under their supervision, in deferring to the prejudices of the communities which they desired to attract and benfit, were not inspirations for the guidance of our civilization in matters of political co-operation; and every apparent inhibition of the levelment of the caste of sex may be neutralized by selections of other paragraphs and by the general spirit and trend of the Holy Book.

In the history of human advancement no single influence has been so powerful as that of the Bible. It has sufficed for all the ages passed and will suffice for the ages to come. To its students has come wisdom. Its precepts have trained to virtue. To the wretched it has afforded comfort, and to the sorrowing it has brought consolation. None have learned from it bad citizenship, and its guidance has ever led to gentleness, honor, and truth. Its histories, poems, and inspired directions, altogether, inculcate the broadest equality of the human race and the greatest tenderness of mutual rights, while its pyramidion, the Golden Rule, voiced by the Saviour, contains the essence of all the law and the prophets.

Sir, my reverence for this grandest of all compilations, human or divine, compels a protest against its being cast into the street as a barricade against every moral, political, and social reform; lest, when the march of progress shall have swept on and over to its consummation, it may appear to the superficial observer that it is the Bible which has been overthrown and not its erroneous interpretation.

TRADITION AND PREJUDICE SHOULD BE LAID ASIDE.

Sir, if, with our present experience of the needs and dangers of co-operative government and our present observation of woman's social and economic status, we could divest ourselves of our traditions and prejudices, and the question of suffrage should come up for incorporation into a new organic law, a distinction based upon sex would not be entertained for a moment.

It seems to me that we should divest ourselves to the utmost extent possible of these entanglements of tradition and judicially examine three questions relative to the proposed extension of suffrage: First. Is it right? Second. Is it desirable? Third. Is it expedient? If these be determined affirmatively our duty is plain.

IS IT RIGHT?

If the right of the governed and the taxed to a voice in determining by whom they shall be governed and to what extent and for what purposes they may be taxed is not a natural right, it is nevertheless a right to the declaration and establishment of which by the fathers we owe all that we possess of liberty. They declared taxation without representation to be tyranny, and grappled with the most powerful nation of their day in a seven years' struggle for the overthrow of such tyranny.

It appears incredible to me that any one can indorse the principles proclaimed by the patriots of 1776 and deny their application to women.

Samuel Adams said:

Representation and legislation, as well as taxation, are inseparable, according to the spirit of our Constitution and of all others that are free.

Again, he said:

No man can be justly taxed by, or bound in conscience to obey, any law to which he has not given his consent in person or by his representative.

And again:

No man can take another's property from him without his consent. This is the law of nature; and a violation of it is the same thing whether it is done by one man, who is called a king, or by five hundred of another denomination.

James Otis, in speaking of the rights of the colonists as descendants of Englishmen, said they "were not to be cheated out of them by any phantom of virtual representation or any other fiction of law or politics."

Again:

No such phrase as virtual representation is known in law or constitution. It is altogether a subtlety and illusion, wholly unfounded and absurd.

The Declaration of Independence asserts that, to secure the inalienable rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, governments are instituted among men, "deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

Benjamin Franklin wrote.

That liberty or freedom consists in having an actual share in the appointment of those who frame the laws and who are the guardians of every man's life, property, and peace.

That they who have no voice nor vote in the electing of representatives do not enjoy liberty, but are absolutely enslaved to those who have votes and to their representatives.

James Madison said:

Under every view of the subject, it seems indispensable that the mass of the citizens should not be without a voice in making the laws which they are to obey, and in choosing the magistrates who are to administer them.

But it seems unnecessary to multiply these excerpts, familiar to every student of the history of those times.

These declarations were not confined to our shores.

Lord Somers said:

Among all the rights and privileges appertaining unto us, that of having a share in the legislation, and being governed by such laws as we ourselves shall cause, is the most fundamental and essential as well as the most advantageous and beneficial.

The judicious Hooker wrote:

Agreeable to the same just privileges of natural equity is that maxim of the English constitution that "Law to bind all must be assented to by all," and there can be no legal appearance of assent without some degree of representation.

In 1790, Condorcet, in his treatise on the admission of women to the rights of citizenship in France, says:

Now, the rights of men result solely from the fact that they are rational beings, susceptible of acquiring moral ideas and reasoning on those ideas. Women, having the same qualities, have the same equal rights. Either no one individual of the human kind has true rights or all have the same, and one who votes against the right of another, whatever be that other's religion, color, or sex, from that moment forfeits his own.

Mirabeau condenses the whole question in his definition that "a representative body should be a miniature of the whole community."

The right of women to personal representation through the ballot seems to me unassailable, wherever the right of man is conceded and exercised. I can conceive of no possible abstract justification for the exclusion of the one and the inclusion of the other.

IS IT DESIRABLE?

Is the recognition of this right desirable? The earliest mention of the Saxon peoples is found in the Germany of Tacitus, and, in his terse description of them, he states that "in all grave matters they consult their women." Can we afford to dispute the benefit of this counseling in the advancement of our race?

The measure of the civilization of any nation may be no more surely ascertained by its consumption of salt than by the social, economic, and political status of its women.

It is not enough for contentment that we assert the superiority of our women in intelligence, virtue, and self-sustaining qualities, but we are to consider the profit to them and to the State in their further advancement.

Our statistics are lamentably meager in information as to the status of our women outside their mere enumeration, but we learn that in a single State 42,000 are assessed and pay one-eleventh of the total burden of taxation, with no voice in its disbursement.

From the imperfect gleaning of the Tenth Census we learn that of the total enumerated bread-winners of the United States more than one-seventh are women. They are classified in round terms as follows: Agriculture, 600,000; professional and personal services, 1,400,000; trade and transportation, 60,000; manufactures and mechanical and mining industries, 600,000. That these 2,647,157 citizens of whom we have official information labor from necessity, and are everywhere underpaid, is within the knowledge and observation of every Senator upon this floor.

Only the Government makes any pretense of paying women in accordance with the labor performed—without submitting them to the competition of their starving sisters, whose natural dignity and self-respect have suffered from being driven by the fierce pressure of want into the few and crowded avenues for the exchange of their labor for bread.

Is it not the highest exhibit of the moral superiority of our women that so very few consent to exchange pinching penury for gilded vice?

Will the possession of the ballot multiply and widen these avenues to self-support and independence?

The most thoughtful women who have given the subject thorough examination believe it, and I can not but infer that many men, looking only to their own selfish interests, fear it.

History teaches that every class which has assumed political responsibility has been materially elevated and improved thereby, and I can not believe that the rule would have an exception in the women of to-day.

I do not say that to the idealized women so generally described by obstructionists—the dainty darlings whose prototypes are to be found in the heroines of Walter Scott and Fennimore Cooper—immediate awakening would come; but to the toilers, the wage-workers, and the women of affairs the consequent enlargement of possibilities would give new courage and stimulate to new endeavor, and the state would be the gainer thereby.

The often urged fear that the degraded and vicious would swarm to the polls, while the intelligent and virtuous would stand aloof, is fully met by the fact that the former class has never asked for the suffrage or shown interest in its seeking, while the hundreds of thousands of petitioners are from our best and noblest women, including those whose efforts for the amelioration of the wrongs and sufferings of others have won for them imperishable tablets in the temple of humanity.

Would fear be entertained that the state would suffer mortal harm if, by some strange revolution, its exclusive control should be turned over to an oligarchy composed of such women as have been and are identified with the agitation for the political emancipation of their sex?

Saloons, brothels, and gaming-houses might vanish before such na administration; wars—avoidable with safety and honor—might not be undertaken and taxes might be diverted to purposes of general sanitation and higher education, but neither in these respects nor in efforts to lift the bowed and strengthen the weak would the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness be placed in peril.

Women have exercised the highest civil powers in all ages of the world—from Zenobia to Victoria—and have exhibited statecraft and military capacity of high degree without detracting from their graces as women or their virtues as mothers.

A woman, Mrs. Ross, designed the American flag.

The records of all wars show the presence of women in the ranks. More than four hundred were discovered in the Union Army who had eluded the scrutiny of the mustering officers and served in disguise.

The services of Clara Barton, Dorothea Dix, Elizabeth Blackwell, and hundreds of other noble women were as valuable as any received.

That the most important campaign of that war was planned by Anna Ella Carroll is attested by the report of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives March 3, 1881, as "fully established," and was vouched for in elaborate detail by Hon. B. F. Wade, chairman of the Committee on the Conduct of the War, soon after its triumphant close permitted him to speak.

The rallying of a Michigan regiment by Ann Ethridge and leading them again into the hot fires of Chancellorsville was only a repetition of the chivalrous deeds of women recorded in every age.

The preponderance of women in our churches, our charitable organizations, our educational councils has been of such use as to suggest the benefit of their incorporation into our voting force to the least observant.

A woman who owns railroad or manufacturing or mining stock may vote unquestioned by the side of the brightest business men of our continent, but if she transfers her property into real estate she loses all voice in its control.

Their abilities, intellectual, physical, and political, are as various as ours, and they err who set up any single standard, however lovely, by which to determine the rights, needs, and possibilities of the sex.

To me the recognition of their capacity for full citizenship is right and desirable, and it only remains to consider whether it is safe, whether it is expedient.

IS IT EXPEDIENT?

To this let experience answer to the extent that the experiment has been tried.

During the first thirty years of the independence of New Jersey, universal suffrage was only limited by a property qualification; but we do not learn that divorces were common, that families were more divided on political than on religious differences, that children were neglected or that patriotism languished, although the first seven years of that experiment were years of decimating war, and the remaining twenty-three of poverty and recuperation—conditions most conducive to discontent and erratic legislation.

The reports from Wyoming, which I have examined, are uniform in satisfaction with the system, and I do not learn therefrom that women require greater physical strength, fighting qualities, or masculinity to deposit a ballot than a letter or visiting-card; while in their service as jurors they have exhibited greater courage than their brothers in finding verdicts against desperadoes in accordance with the facts.

Governors, judges, officers, and citizens unite in praises of the influence of women upon the making and execution of wholesome laws.

In Washington Territory, last fall, out of a total vote of 40,000, 12,000 ballots were cast by women, and everywhere friends were rejoiced and opponents silenced as apprehended dangers vanished upon approach.

Some of the comments of converted newspaper editors which have reached us are worthy of preservation and future reference. The elections were quiet and peaceable for the first time; the brawls of brutal men gave place to the courtesies of social intercourse; saloons were closed, and nowhere were the ladies insulted or in any way annoyed. From the Isle of Man, where universal suffrage obtains, comes similar approval.

Women vote intelligently and safely, and it does not appear that their place is solely at home any more than that the farmer should never leave his farm, the mechanic his shop, the teacher his desk, the clergyman his study, or the professional man his office for the purpose of expressing his wishes and opinions at the tribunal of the ballot-box.

To-day—and to a greater extent in the near future—we are confronted with political conditions dangerous to the integrity of our nation.

In the unforeseen but consistent absorption from immigrants and former bondsmen of a vast army of untrained voters, without restrictions as to intelligence, character, or patriotism, many political economists see the material for anarchy and public demoralization.

It is claimed that the necessities of parties compel subserviency to the lawless and vicious classes in our cities, and that, without the addition of a counterbalancing element, the enactment and enforcement of wholesome statutes will soon be impossible.

Fortunately that needed element is not far to seek. It stands at the door of the Congress urging annexation. In its strivings for justice it has cried aloud in petitions from the best of our land, and more than one-third of the present voters of five States have indorsed its cause. Its advocates are no longer the ridiculed few but the respected many. A list of the leaders of progressive thought of this generation who espouse and urge this reform would be too long and comprehensive for recital.

Mr. President, I do not ask the submission of this amendment, nor shall I urge its adoption because it is desired by a portion of the American women, although in intelligence, property, and numbers that portion would seem to have every requisite for the enforcement of their demands; neither are we bound to give undue regard to the timidity and hesitation of that possibly larger portion who shrink from additional responsibilities; but I ask and shall urge it because the nation has need of the co-operation of women in its direction.

The war power of every government compels, upon occasion, all citizens of suitable age and physique to leave their homes, families, and avocations to be merged in armies, whether they be willing or unwilling, craven or bold, patriotic or indifferent, and no one gainsays the right, because the necessities of state require their services.

We have passed the harsh stages incident to our permanent institution. We have conquered our independence, conquered the respect of European powers, conquered our neighbors on the Western Continent, and at vast cost of life and waste have conquered our internal differences and emerged a nation unquestioned from without or within.

Our heroic and semi-barbarous ages have closed and slumber in history, never, I trust, to be reacted.

The great questions of the future conduct of our people are to be economic and social ones. No one questions the superiority of womanly instincts, and consequent thought, in the latter, and the repeated failures and absurdities exhibited by male legislators in the treatment of the former, should give pause to any assertion of superiority there.

The day has come when the counsel and service of women is required by the highest interests of the state, and who shall gainsay their conscription?

We place the ballot in the keeping of immigrants who have grown middle aged or old in the environment of governments dissimilar to the spirit and purpose of ours, and we do well; because the responsibility accompanying the trust tends to examination, comparison, and consequent political education; but we decline to avail ourselves of the aid of our daughters, wives, and mothers, who were born and are already educated under our system, reading the same newspapers, books and, periodicals as ourselves, proud of our common history, tenacious of our theories of human rights, and solicitous for our future progress.

Whatever may have been wisest as to the extension of suffrage to this tender and humane class, when wars of assertion or conquest were likely to be considered, to-day and to-morrow and thereafter no valid reason seems assignable for longer neglect to avail ourselves of their association.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the joint resolution will be returned to the Calendar.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 7496) for the relief of Wehrle, Werk & Son was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H. R. 3236) for the relief of Ernest H. Wardwell was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HAMPTON. I suggest that the bill be sent to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair directed the reference to the Committee on Claims as from its appearance the bill seems to provide for a claim. If the Senator from South Carolina moves to refer the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs, the Chair will entertain the motion.

Mr. HAMPTON. It is similar to the Senate bill which, on my motion, was recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs the other day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the reference will be changed, and the bill will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds:

A bill (H. R. 1013) for the erection of a public building at Troy, N. Y.; and

A bill (H. R. 5674) for the erection of a public building at the city of Tyler, in the State of Texas.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 320) authorizing the printing of the report of the Commissioner of Education for 1883 and 1884 was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

GOVERNMENT BUILDING IN JAPAN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and, with the accompanying documents, ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I herewith transmit a communication from the Secretary of State relative to the Japanese Government's offer to donate a valuable piece of land to the United States in fee-simple for legation purposes, and earnestly recommend that the Executive may be immediately authorized to accept the gift in the name of the United States, and to tender to his Imperial Japanese Majesty's Government a suitable expression of this Government's thanks for the generosity which prompted the presentation of so desirable a site of ground.

I deem it unnecessary to enlarge upon the statement of the Secretary of State. I feel certain, however, that a persual of his communication will at once commend itself to the favorable attention of Congress, and doubt not that the necessary authorization of Congress will be immediately given for the acceptance of the gift, as well as insure early action looking to the erection on the premises of suitable public buildings for the use of the legation of the United States at Tokio. This step can not but be favorable to the United States in every honorable way, while the disinterested motives of a friendly foreign government deserve from us a proper and just recognition.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, February 5, 1885.

THICKNESS OF STEAM-BOILERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1793) to amend section 4434 of title 52 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning commerce and navigation and the regulation of steam-vessels, which was, in line 15, after the word "sounds," to insert "or the great lakes, or any of them, and water flowing to and from the same, or any of them."

Mr. CONGER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The amendment was concurred in.

AMENDMENT TO THE INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. VAN WYCK submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

FEES IN PENSION CASES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill taken up on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON] is now before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2511) relating to claim agents and attorneys in pension cases.

Mr. JACKSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions to propose certain amendments to the bill. At the end of section 2, after the word "pensions," I move to add the words:

Under such regulations as the Commissioner of Pensions may prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JACKSON. In section 3, line 8, after the word "dollars," I move to insert:

Subject to revision by the Commissioner of Pensions as to the amount to be paid.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JACKSON. In section 3, line 11, I move to strike out the word "twenty-eighth" and insert "twentieth;" so as to read: "June 20th, 1878," which is the date of the statute referred to.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JACKSON. In section 5, line 6, after the word "thereof," I move to insert "under such contract;" so as to read:

Or arrears thereof, under such contract, greater than is herein provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JACKSON. In section 6, line 4, I move to strike out the word "twenty-eighth" and insert "twentieth;" so as to read: "20th day of June, 1878."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JACKSON. In section 6, line 16, after the word "duress," I move to strike out all down to and including the word "act," in line 18, in the following words:

For the prosecution of claims filed after the 4th day of July, 1884, and prior to the passage of this act.

And to insert:

In accordance with existing law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. JACKSON. It is proper to explain that amendment, which is the most material one offered by the committee.

Since the passage of the act of July 4, 1884, certain new contracts have been made and entered into for the payment of $25 on the cases pending between 1878 and the date of the passage of that act. Some of those contracts, it is presumable, were entered into fairly and understandingly. If so, it is not in our power to abrogate or disregard them. The purpose of the amendment is to leave in force such contracts as have been entered into under the act of 1884, where those new contracts have not been procured by fraud or duress. We did not feel that we were at liberty to disturb contracts that were fairly entered into under existing law, and so we propose the amendment that those contracts made without fraud or duress, in accordance with the existing law, may stand.

Mr. ALLISON. As I understand this provision, without the amendment suggested by the Senator from Tennessee all contracts fairly made are preserved if they relate to claims filed after the 4th of July, 1884. Taking the whole provision together from the word "provided," in line 14, down to the word "act," in line 18, it preserves all contracts that were entered into since the act of 1884 relating to pension claims filed after July 4, 1884, does it not?

Mr. JACKSON. Yes, sir; I think it does; but the committee had some doubt and preferred to make that perfectly clear.

Mr. ALLISON. If that provision were to stand as found in the bill, and then if the repealing clause were to stand, all contracts made respecting pension claims filed after the 20th of June, 1878, and before the 4th of July, 1884, would be nullified by the bill.

Mr. JACKSON. That is not the purpose of the amendment, and it was not the intention of the committee. If it has that effect, of course we had better leave it as the bill originally stood, and the amendment ought to be voted down, for that was not the intention of the committee.

Mr. ALLISON. What I wish to call the attention of the Senator to is this: The Committee on Appropriations considered this clause and they agreed with the Committee on Pensions that we could not nullify contracts fairly made relating to pension claims filed after the 20th of June, 1878. Therefore the Committee on Appropriations suggested an amendment looking to an abrogation of so much of the law as requires the Pension Office to pursue the claim up to the point of payment, leaving the pensioner and the attorney to settle that question as best they may between themselves, not requiring the Pension Office to pursue the claim; so that if the amendment suggested by the Committee on Appropriations to the pension appropriation bill shall be adopted it seems to me the language now found in the bill should be retained.

Mr. JACKSON. The amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations will harmonize exactly with the amendment proposed by me on behalf of the Committee on Pensions. We simply mean that new contracts which have been made and entered into without fraud or duress shall not be disturbed by the bill, and our amendment I think accomplishes that purpose. It makes the proviso read:

Provided, That this act shall not be so construed as to interfere with any contracts, entered into fairly and without fraud or duress, in accordance with existing law.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee a question so that I may understand this matter. In the pension appropriation act of July 4, 1884, there was certain legislation about the fees of pension attorneys. Is it the intention of the committee reporting this bill that where contracts have been entered into since that date under that legislation, without fraud or duress, those contracts shall be validated and preserved?

Mr. JACKSON. Yes, sir; that is just the purpose of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARLAND in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee on behalf of the Committee on Pensions.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JACKSON. I move to add at the end of section 6 the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That in all cases filed after June 20, 1878, and prior to July 4, 1884, where new contracts have been entered into under the act of July 4, 1884, no deduction for attorney's fees shall be made by any pension agent from the pension allowed; but the whole amount of such pension shall be paid directly to the claimant; and in all such cases the Commissioner of Pensions shall certify to the pension agent paying the pension the fact that a new contract has been filed in the Pension Bureau, and on account thereof no deduction shall be made.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JACKSON. In section 7, line 3, I move to strike out the word "heretofore" and insert "or may be;" so as to read:

That this act shall not be so construed as to prohibit any claimant the prosecution of whose claim has been or may be abandoned by his attorney from employing another attorney or agent.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JACKSON. The next amendment that I wish to propose on behalf of the Committee on Pensions is in section 8, line 18, after the word "State" to insert the words "or Territory."

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator from Tennessee whether by section 8 it is intended to prohibit the payment of the fee of $25 by a soldier residing in the District of Columbia to an agent in the District?

Mr. JACKSON. No, sir.

Mr. HARRISON. It does so, I think.

Mr. JACKSON. That was not the intention.

Mr. HARRISON. That is the effect of the section, I think, as it stands.

Mr. JACKSON. I suggest to add "or the District of Columbia;" so as to read:

Provided, That the provisions of this act authorizing contracts for a fee of $25 shall be limited to attorneys or agents residing in the State, or Territory, or the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee modifies his amendment. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JACKSON. The next amendment which I propose on behalf of the Committee on Pensions is in section 8, line 19, after the word "attorneys" to strike out the words "in the District of Columbia" and insert "residing elsewhere;" so as to read:

And shall not extend to agents or attorneys residing elsewhere.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JACKSON. In section 8, line 21, after the word "State," I move to insert the words "or Territory, or the District of Columbia."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JACKSON. I believe that covers all the amendments suggested by the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PLATT. If I may be permitted to go back to the sixth section, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to the apparent effect of that section as amended, according to my understanding of it. I understand that the Senator desires to have the section when amended validate the contracts which have been made since the passage of the act of July 4, 1884, with reference to claims filed since 1878, so that where contracts have been entered into for the payment of more than $10, if those contracts were entered into without fraud or duress, they shall not be interfered with by the bill. I fear that such is not the effect of the section. It provides:

That no agent or attorney shall either demand or receive, on account of the prosecution of any claim provided for under the provisions of this act, where such claim was filed after the 28th day of June, 1878, and prior to the 4th day of July, 1884, any fee or sum of money in excess of $10.

Further on in this section there is this proviso, as amended:

Provided, That this act shall not be so construed as to interfere with any contracts, entered into fairly and without fraud or duress, in accordance with existing law.

Then the repealing clause repeals the law of July 4, 1884, so that when the bill passes that law will not be in existence. It seems to me the effect of it is that as to all contracts which have been made under the act of July 4, 1884, they will not be validated. I do not know that I understand it, but upon a casual examination, having now looked at it for the first time, it seems to me that that is the effect.

Mr. JACKSON. I think it is hardly subject to that criticism inasmuch as this measure recognizes the validity of contracts entered into without fraud or duress under existing law. If you do repeal the existing law, still the contracts made under it are good.

Mr. HARRIS. If my colleague will allow me I suggest that instead of the words "existing law" he substitute the words "existing at the time of making such contract." That would make it perfectly plain.

Mr. JACKSON. Upon the suggestion of my colleague, I will propose to amend it so as to make it read:

In accordance with the laws existing at the time of making such contract.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to amend the amendment already agreed to in section 6, lines 16 to 18, so as to read:

In accordance with the laws existing at the time of making such contract.

Is there objection to modifying the amendment already agreed to in the manner proposed by the Senator from Tennessee? The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like the Senator from Tennessee to explain the object and reason of the proviso in section 8 which declares "that the provisions of this act authorizing contracts for a fee of $25 shall be limited to attorneys or agents residing in the State or Territory or the District of Columbia, where the claimant resides, and shall not extend to agents or attorneys residing elsewhere," and also forbids attorneys resident in a State where the claimant resides "to enter into partnership with or otherwise to divide the fee of $25 with any attorney or agent" residing elsewhere. The provisions are certainly novel, and unless there is some reason other than that which has been presented to the Senate, I should say that they were of doubtful propriety. The Senator from Tennessee may of course have information that is denied to the rest of us at this time.

Mr. JACKSON. I have no special information in reference to it. The whole Senate is familiar with what has taken place under the inadvertent legislation of July 4, 1884.

Mr. INGALLS. I am not familiar with it. I should be very glad if the Senator would state what the practice has been under that legislation which requires the adoption of this proviso.

Mr. JACKSON. I only refer to that incidentally; but the general idea of the committee was that this business could be done better, more safely, and at less expense to the pensioner if conducted in the locality of his residence; and that when we are legislating upon the subject of fees, and to increase fees, we should, as far as possible, encourage the claims being investigated as near the locality of the applicant as possible.

Mr. INGALLS. There is much force in what the Senator from Tennessee states upon that point; but take an illustration: Suppose that in some remote locality upon the frontier an attorney has two or three pension cases which are submitted to him for preparation. Of course he takes that in connection with his other business. It is absolutely essential that he should have some information or some co-operation elsewhere, it may be here at the capital, from attorneys who are competent to act in these cases and who have special information. What is the reason why such an attorney, having two or three cases, should be forbidden from saying to anybody residing here that for the assistance he will render at the Pension Office he shall have a portion of the fee?

Mr. JACKSON. If the Senator will notice the eighth section of the bill he will see that that provision relates alone to this proposed contingent fee of $25. If we increased the claim agent's contingent fee to $25 we thought it advisable and good policy to let that class of cases go as near the locality of the claimant as possible.

Mr. INGALLS. Is not the fee of $25 dependent upon the decision of the Commissioner of Pensions?

Mr. JACKSON. No, sir; if the contract is made without fraud the attorney gets his $25 without reference to the sanction or approval of the Commissioner.

Mr. INGALLS. I thought the discretion of the Commissioner of Pensions was reserved in the bill.

Mr. JACKSON. I think not, sir.

Mr. INGALLS. I am very clear that the Senator's reading is different from mine.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Tennessee introduced an amendment to that effect.

Mr. JACKSON. Yes, sir; I beg pardon.

Mr. INGALLS. That amendment was agreed to, and therefore it is now a part of the bill.

Mr. JACKSON. I was thinking of the bill as originally reported. We have made an amendment which makes it subject to the approval of the Commissioner.

Mr. INGALLS. So that this fee of $25 is conditioned, as the bill now stands, upon the decision of the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of Pensions?

Mr. JACKSON. Yes, sir; upon the approval of the Commissioner.

Mr. INGALLS. Therefore there is no longer any doubt or danger about the pension applicant being imposed upon by agreeing to pay a fee larger than what equity would require. With that safeguard, what is the reason, in the case I have suggested, why an attorney having but two or three applicants who have applied to him for assistance should be denied the privilege of saying to some attorney here in this District who has access to the Department that for the purpose of filing the papers and ascertaining the status of the case he would divide with him the emolument he is to receive?

Mr. JACKSON. In the individual case stated by the Senator from Kansas there would be an apparent hardship, but the committee thought it would be the best and wisest policy of legislation upon the subject of increasing fees to transfer the business as far as possible to the locality of the applicant for a pension. We know, and we can not as Senators shut our eyes to the facts, that the existence of the pension claims agencies here leads to a great deal of pernicious legislation. Those agents press the Senate, they press the committees in various ways, and through their influence and by inadvertence and inattention pernicious legislation creeps in upon the subject of pensions. The Committee on Pensions thought it was wise policy to transfer this business, so far as could be done by legislation, to the locality of the pension applicant.

Mr. PLATT. The practice of sending pension claims to agents in Washington has been attended with a great many evils. On the other hand the practice of employing persons in the localities where the pensioner resides is attended with a great many evils. I do not know which practice is the better. The pension agents here in Washington send out circulars and secure the business, and having once secured it the applicants feel that it is not thoroughly and properly attended to. I do not undertake to say whether such is the case; but if the pension is not granted pretty quickly the applicant becomes thoroughly discouraged and disheartened and feels that his business is not attended to, and therefore begins to be discontented and finds fault with the pension attorneys here in Washington. But, on the other hand, if a fee of $25 is provided for a local attorney and not for an agent here in Washington, the effect of it I apprehend will be to put the business of soliciting pensions into the hands of local attorneys who have really no understanding of the rules and requirements of the Pension Office, and who, therefore, will not properly prosecute the claims. Either practice has a great many evils connected with it. I confess that I do not know which is the better practice.

But I rose for the purpose of saying that I believe the pension applicants in my own State would be much better served if the business were given to the officer who has been appointed by the State of Connecticut for the especial purpose of procuring pensions and attending to claims for back pay and bounty. We have, and have had for a long series of years, I think for as many as fifteen years, an officer appointed and paid by the State, who is called the assistant adjutant-general of the State, and whose sole duty is to represent pension applicants and soldiers in their claims against the Government. Yet, in practice and experience, very few applicants go to that officer. Although being the agent of the State, he has a standing in the Pension Office, is recognized as such, although no friction or controversy is likely to arise between such an agent and the office, for some reason or other the claims are given either to local attorneys, who are utterly incompetent in some instances to prosecute the claim, or to the pension agents in Washington, who, if competent, are supposed, at least by those who intrust business to their care, to neglect it.

I do not know whether this evil can be remedied. There is in the country to-day no such prosecution of pension claims as there ought to be. If the Committee on Pensions has thoroughly considered this matter, and believe that it is better really to transfer the business of prosecuting claims from the District of Columbia to the localities where the claimants reside, I shall go with the committee and vote with it, although I can see the evils which will attend that practice also.

Mr. BLAIR. Any legislation upon this subject is bad—bad continuously. In my belief, the legislation upon this subject had more to do with the evils that exist in this country in the prosecution of pension claims than any other one cause that can be named.

This business is like any other business, and the principles of human nature will assert themselves. It is a somewhat difficult business to perform, and incompetent men can not perform it. Competent men, in order that their services may be secured, are able to obtain fair compensation for what they do. To prosecute a pension claim, especially in these later years when such great difficulties attend the collection of testimony, its proper preparation, putting it in the right form, and a compliance with the various requirements of the law, is so difficult a matter that a certain degree of skilled service is necessary to its proper performance.

We have interfered, as we do not interfere between attorney and client, between the principal and the agent, in any other case whatever so far as I know, and we have interfered with the best motive in the world—that is, for the protection of the pensioner or the claimant upon the bounty of the Government. In order to prevent extortion we have undertaken by an iron rule to limit the compensation of the attorney; and in doing that we have fixed the rate of compensation so very low that the business has fallen almost universally into the hands of incompetent men or a class of shysters who for the small fee are willing to take charge of the claims, hoping by fraud and evasion of the law to obtain fair compensation for the services which they actually do render, and which services are as a rule entirely without value to the claimant. By the confusion which is created in the preparation of testimony, by the incompetency displayed in the discharge of the duty when it is assumed on the part of the agent, the difficulties surrounding the case originally are increased rather than diminished.

On the other hand, those men knowing the merits of the cause, living in the locality of the applicant, knowing the difficulties that surround the case, having the necessary qualifications belonging to the legal profession, or other men who have sufficient capacity to discharge the duties under the pension laws in the way of establishing the claims, have not been willing to undertake the work. They have failed to do it, and the legislation of the country has come to just this in its practical effect: We have said to applicants for pensions, to claimants upon the bounty of the Government, "You are entitled to certain rights, to certain pecuniary compensation for services and sacrifices which you have made for the country and the disability which you have contracted in its service;" but at the same time we have denied them that sort of justice which is necessary to the establishment of their claims. We have said to those who would have undertaken to assist them: "You shall have such compensation as is not sufficient to command your time and your skill." The consequence is that honest, competent men throughout the country have not undertaken this business, and they will not touch it.

That really is the source of the difficulties that attend the administration of the pension laws far more than any other cause that may be found. Originating, as I say this legislation did, in the best of motives, it has been the one great evil that has attended and that to-day attends the administration of the pension laws. In my belief it is an evil which will never be reached and remedied until we take that course which appears to be the necessary and proper course with reference to the regulation of business like this in all other cases.

I would repeal all the laws there are with reference to compensation to the attorneys who may prosecute pension claims, but I would enact the most stringent criminal legislation against those who may practice extortion upon these claimants against the Government. The result of that would be, as I think, that the claimant would find assistance at home. If he has a good case there are plenty of men with skill and honesty who would undertake its prosecution and who would see him through; the community would do it; but when there is nothing to be paid at all adequate to the service that is to be rendered, or to the money that must be advanced and paid out, the proper legal assistance is not likely to be found. It has not been found hitherto, it is not likely to be found hereafter, and these difficulties will continue.

I believe that if we should repeal the existing legislation in regard to the compensation of claim agents and leave this matter open to the natural operation of the laws of human nature, and then enact very stringent measures both by way of fine and imprisonment wherever there is any extortion practiced on a claimant, we should reach the seat of the trouble. That I suppose is not likely to be done. I presume the legislation proposed in the bill is as good as anything else and as bad as anything else that we are likely to get; but it will not reach the great evil, and the rights of those who have pension claims are not likely to be vindicated for many years to come.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I am not sure that I understand this bill as well as I ought to do; and, therefore, perhaps I ought not to speak in regard to it; but we have had the matter under consideration in the Committee on Appropriations for some time and very flagrant irregularities at least have been made apparent. The House of Representatives has attempted, as far as it can, in the pension appropriation bill sent to us, to remedy these wrongs; and it seems now we are about to undo all the remedial legislation that has come to us in the bill from the House, which I hold in my hand, making appropriations for the payment of pensions for the year ending June 30, 1886. On the 20th of June, 1878, a law was passed, which reads thus:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That it shall be unlawful for any attorney, agent, or other person to demand or receive for his services in a pension case a greater sum than $10. No fee-contract shall hereafter be filed with the Commissioner of Pensions in any case. In pending cases, in which a fee-contract has heretofore been filed, if the pension shall be allowed the Commissioner of Pensions shall approve the same, as to the amount of the fee to be paid, at the amount specified in the contract.

That continued to be the law until 1884. Under that act, if I properly understand the late report of the Commissioner of Pensions, on page 22, he shows that the total number of original claims pending on the 30th of June, 1884, was 239,590, and the number of claims on rejected files, June 30, 1884, was 138,723, making a total of 378,313. All of these, at least nearly all of them, come under the provisions of the act of 1878, which allowed only a fee of $10. The pension agents came before Congress and endeavored to have their fees increased beyond that amount. Both Houses refused to do it. The bill went into a conference committee, and after the claims of these men had been rejected by both Houses, without a vote in either House, without the consent of either House, a clause was added in the act of July 4, 1884, which provided—

That section 4785 of the Revised Statutes is hereby re-enacted and amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 4785. No agent or attorney or other person shall demand or receive any other compensation for his services in prosecuting a claim for pension or bounty land than such as the Commissioner of Pensions shall direct to be paid to him, not exceeding $25; nor shall such agent, attorney, or other person demand or receive such compensation, in whole or in part, until such pension or bounty-land claim shall be allowed: Provided, That in all claims allowed since June 20, 1878, where it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Pensions that the fee of $10, or any part thereof, has not been paid, he shall cause the same to be deducted from the pension, and the pension agent to pay the same to the recognized attorney."

I believe that was the clause inserted in conference. It was the clause.

Mr. JACKSON. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to explain that?

Mr. BECK. I desire to have it explained.

Mr. JACKSON. The House bill and the Senate bill on the subject of attorneys' fees, reported at the last session, excepted from its operation all the claims filed after the 20th of June, 1878, and prior to the passage of the proposed legislation.

Mr. BECK. I know that.

Mr. JACKSON. That clause in the conference committee was stricken out, so that these $25 contracts now relate back and cover all the claims that were filed under the act of June 20, 1878.

Mr. BECK. That is what I understand.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator from Kentucky yield to me, because I wish to say one word on this question?

Mr. BECK. Yes; I want to get at the facts.

Mr. ALLISON. It is also true that the provision which came from the House was struck out under our rule, so that when the bill went back to the House there was no legislation on it except what the House proposed. That threw the whole legislation into the hands of the conference committee. I wish the Senator from Kentucky to allow me to state right here that the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Pensions, at least the present Commissioner of Pensions, both insisted that the legislation was wise and in accordance with the precedents. I mention that for the purpose of relieving the conference committee of any desire or apparent wish to put into a bill what was not recommended by the proper administrative officers of the pension system.

Mr. BECK. Still the Senator from Iowa will, I believe, agree with me that when a conference committee meets to decide between the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, neither the Secretary of the Interior nor the Commissioner of Pensions nor anybody else has any right to come before that committee and advise them in regard to anything.

Mr. ALLISON. I quite agree with the Senator from Kentucky. They have no right to do that.

Mr. BECK. Any officer who forces himself before a conference committee is derelict in his duty, or any conference committee which allows a man to come before them to bring about a decision upon anything, other than the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, is derelict in its duty. When they opened up all the cases between 1878 and 1884, and allowed a fee of $25 instead of $10 to be taken, they were taking just that much money out of the pockets of the pensioners and putting it into the hands of pension agents without the will of either House of Congress and against the known will of both. Consider the amount of money to be paid to the attorneys upon the claims reported by the Commissioner of Pensions pending on that day, which I have just read, 239,590 pending, and 138,723 which had been rejected but were still being pressed for restoration, and perhaps will be all or in great part restored, as the Commissioner told us the other day. It puts into the pockets of the pension agents on the 239,590 cases, of which there is no dispute, at the rate of $15 increase, the sum of $3,593,850; and when, on the rejected claims which are being pressed for restoration, $15 each is added, it makes the sum of $2,080,845 more. The grand total out of which the pensioners were robbed—for that is the word—robbed by this legislation, and which was paid or is to be paid into the hands of pension agents, in violation of their agreements under the law of 1878, amounts to the enormous sum of $5,674,695. The pension agents or attorneys agreed to do that work for $10 for each case; they had in many instances received the money, and when they managed to get the legislation of last summer through the conference committee, as I said against the will of both Houses, on the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of Pensions, or anybody else, who had no business before that committee, they robbed the pensioners of this country of over five and a half million dollars. Many of them, according to the information laid before the Committee on Appropriations, had abandoned the cases that were then pending. They had got their $10 in advance, and they sold out to other men their good-will, and the papers of a pensioner were withheld until he had to sign a contract to make the fee $25. The first fellow got his $10, and then abandoned the case and sold out to somebody else, who got $15 more or the applicant for a pension could not even have his papers presented.

Now the House of Representatives comes and demands that that legislation shall be repealed as a fraud upon the pensioners of the country. That is demanded in a bill now pending before the Senate. The legislation of the House was stricken out pro forma by the Committee on Appropriations in order to comply with the rules of the Senate; but if not all, certainly a large majority of the members of the Committee on Appropriations, reserved the right not only to vote for but to maintain that legislation on this floor and elsewhere, and to insist that the House of Representatives was right in demanding the repeal and in refusing to recognize the action which had been thus surreptitiously obtained in 1884. The provision of the pension appropriation bill from the House is as follows:

That no agent or attorney shall either demand or receive, on account of the prosecution of any claim provided for under the provisions of this act, where such claim was filed after the 28th day of June, 1878, and prior to the 4th day of July, 1884—

Being the time when that law was in force—

any fee or sum of money in excess of $10; nor shall said $10, or any part thereof, be paid to any agent or attorney until he make and file in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions the affidavit provided for in section 4 of this act; and if it shall appear from said affidavit, or in any other way, that all or any part of said $10 has been paid, it shall be deducted therefrom, and the residue, if any, shall be paid to such attorney as hereinbefore provided.

Mr. JACKSON. Will the Senator from Kentucky yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACKSON. The Committee on Pensions would have been pleased to have retained the bill as it came from the House if we thought we could have enforced that provision. Will the Senator suggest that it is in the power of Congress to disturb those contracts which have been entered into under the act of 1884, even admitting that the act went through without notice?

Mr. BECK. I believe that fraud vitiates everything. I believe that a fraud was perpetrated upon the committees of conference of the two Houses.

Mr. JACKSON. We save the cases where the contract was under fraud or duress.

Mr. BECK. I want them to go to the courts. The same power that made the recommendation to give them the $25 in the Department of the Interior or the Pension Office will never see a fraud. Let them go to the courts of the country and get their fee, and not put it in the hands of the very men who aided them in perpetrating the fraud to decide whether it was a fraud or not. That is what I insist upon. The House assume upon the very face of the bill (and the facts will warrant them before any court in the country) that this clause inserted, that $15 should be added in each case, amounting to over $5,000,000, in violation of contracts, was a duress; and I will not trust any Commissioner of Pensions or any Secretary of the Interior to pass upon it, especially when the Senator from Iowa says the Secretary and the Commissioner advised this to be done after both Houses had rejected it, and when a committee of conference yielded to the pressure of men who had no right to speak to them about matters pending before them when they were only conferring properly about the differences between the two Houses.

Mr. JACKSON. The Senator will allow me to say that I should be perfectly willing to enact that legislation and disturb these contracts if we had the power to do it. The question with the committee and the question with me as a lawyer was, assuming that some of these contracts might be valid, having been entered into freely and understandingly, whether Congress had power to invalidate them.

Mr. SAULSBURY. We can in appropriating money provide that none of the money we appropriate shall be applied to such contracts.

Mr. ALLISON. I fear that I may have been myself misunderstood. I want to say that the Secretary of the Interior, I understand, recommended this legislation, and I know, as does the Senator from Kentucky, that the present Commissioner of Pensions stated before the Committee on Appropriations that he would allow this legislation to stand. I did not mean to say that the Commissioner of Pensions at the time this legislation was proposed recommended it, because I do not know whether he did or not.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Kentucky will allow me to say that I understand from the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, who sits beside me [Mr. MITCHELL], that Colonel Dudley, then the Commissioner of Pensions, did not advise or favor this legislation.

Mr. ALLISON. I did not mean to say that he did so advise, and that was why I wished to correct myself if the Senator from Kentucky misunderstood me.

Mr. JACKSON. I wish, in reply to the suggestion made by the Senator from Delaware, to remark that one of the amendments we have adopted prevents the Commissioner of Pensions from using any portion of the pension fund to pay these pension attorneys the $25 fee.

Mr. BECK. And I hope it goes further and does not allow the Commissioner of Pensions to detail clerks, as he is now detailing them, to work up the cases wherein the men claim they have not even got the $10 for their former services in obtaining a pension. That is another cloak of wrong. In other words, the pension agents have managed in this legislation to obtain without the will of either House all they ask; and a more skillfully drawn proposition to rob the pensioners and violate their own contracts and coerce out of them $25 each in two hundred and odd thousand cases when they had agreed to do the work for $10 never was devised. I am prepared to annul it, and stand by the House in annulling it, and I believe every court in the country will stand by the House in annulling that legislation whenever the facts are fairly presented.

I know that these agents, many of them not lawyers, not pretending to be lawyers, get up these claims in the country and send them here to Washington, and go into combination with people here who have made fortunes out of the misfortunes of these poor men, and every Senator here, and I suppose every Representative, has to go to the Department day after day; I have presented hundreds of cases myself for the poorest people all over Kentucky, many of whom can neither read nor write. We have to do all the work of preparing their cases and getting them through, and then there stands a bummer at the other end to receive $25 out of the money which he neither helped to get nor had the capacity to tell how to aid the pensioner in obtaining.

That is the way nine-tenths of these men get their fees. There is not a Senator here who does not know it. I have presented five hundred cases since the 1st day of December, in my opinion, and have employed the time of my secretary and myself to work them through and get the proofs, or tell the parties how to get them, while these agents are increasing their compensation from $10 up to $25 by law, going into conference committees and getting men to recommend that they ought to have it when they did more harm than good in the effort to obtain a pension. They never go to the Pension Office; they never see the papers; but induce the applicants to write to their Representatives and Senators, as they do; every Senator knows it. Then they get this sort of legislation for their own benefit. I do not care whether the House is right or wrong in putting on appropriation bills legislation to meet this. The most radical remedy to reach such men and to stop their robbery of the poor people ought to be applied and take the chances of the courts sustaining it.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, this bill provides in the eighth section—

That the provisions of this act authorizing contracts for a fee of $25 shall be limited to attorneys or agents residing in the State where the claimant resides, and shall not extend to agents or attorneys in the District of Columbia.

The Constitution provides that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." Now, I suppose the right to contract with a pension agent in the States is a privilege of a citizen. I presume that a citizen of the District of Columbia is not excluded from the right to contract with a citizen of a State, equally with a citizen of any other State, although the District is not a State. I have never heard that it was within the power of Congress to provide that the people who live in the District of Columbia shall not have the privileges of the citizens of each State; and manifestly the Constitution is not intended to have any such construction; and yet this bill provides that because a man lives in the District of Columbia he shall not have the same right to contract with a pensioner that a man has who lives in a State. It is suggested by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] he may be a citizen of some other State temporarily residing here in the District, but manifestly there is no propriety in a provision which discriminates between citizens of the United States, whether in the District of Columbia or in the States.

Then, again, I am at loss to know where Congress gets the power to punish criminally a man who makes a contract with another citizen of the United States for the payment of a fee. I do not find anything in the powers given to Congress which justifies that. The eighth section of the first article of the Constitution provides that "Congress shall have power to provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States;" shall have power "to define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas and offenses against the law of nations." But the right of contract, the power of making a contract in good faith with another citizen, is not included within any of these terms and descriptions, and it never was so intended.

It certainly is competent for Congress to provide that so far as the money appropriated for pensions is concerned it shall be paid entirely to the pensioner, and that no fee at all shall be charged, or that any specific amount shall be charged; and yet that would not interfere with the right of contract between those citizens. When a man gets his money, it is no crime in him to give, and there is no power in Congress to say that it shall be a crime for another man to accept from him any part of that money.

But this bill does not limit itself to ascertaining and fixing the payment of the money in the hands of the pensioner, but it makes it a crime and punishes severely the man who contracts with another one. Section 5 provides—

That any agent or attorney or other person instrumental in prosecuting any claim for pension, or arrears thereof, who shall directly or indirectly contract for, demand, or receive and retain any compensation for his services or instrumentality for prosecuting a claim for pension, or arrears thereof, greater than is herein provided, or in any other manner than herein provided, or shall willfully or knowingly make a false statement in regard to the amount of fee already received, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall for every such offense be fined not exceeding $1,000, or be confined at hard labor not exceeding two years, or both, at the discretion of the court.

In my judgment this bill is not within the power of Congress to pass, nor do I think it good policy. I agree with the Senator from Kentucky as to the wrong and bad policy of allowing pension agents to appropriate a large portion of the money voted to pensioners. I think it very proper that a limitation should be laid upon the fee so far as concerns the payment of it by the proper officers of the Government. But I do not concur in the provisions of this bill that make it a crime for a man to contract with another one for the payment of a reasonable fee for his services.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not wish to interpose a hasty consideration (and that is all I have been able to give to the eighth section) against the more mature consideration of the lawyers upon the committee. If I understood the Senator from Tennessee, when the object of the provisions of this section was inquired for by the Senator from Kansas, it was put on the ground of abuses which had grown up here in connection with the claim-agency business in the District of Columbia; and the bill seems originally to have been framed with the sole view of putting a limitation upon the power of agents in the District of Columbia to contract for a fee of more than $10; but as it has been amended it is in this shape: it applies to the States as well. If the object is to bring the attorney into the neighborhood of the claimant, so that he may reach his witnesses readily, and may render him efficient service, the amendments which have been adopted would very often defeat that very thing.

A pension claimant residing near the line of a State would be prohibited from making a contract, within three miles or within one mile of the place of his residence, with an attorney in a case that seemed to justify a fee of $25, but would under the bill be authorized to make it in his own State at a distance of two hundred miles from where he resided. It seems to me that that distinction is of doubtful propriety. If it be best at all to allow a contract for a fee of $25 it seems to me that to limit it within State lines is not proper. It may be that a claimant in my own State would be much more accessible to Cincinnati and would be able to have a much more reliable and efficient agent there than he would at Indianapolis or Terre Haute; and yet under this bill he could not contract with an agent at Cincinnati to give him a fee of $25 for getting his claim through, but he could contract with a man living two hundred miles from him.

It does not seem to me that this division upon State lines can be justified. I think the reason which has been stated, namely, improper practices here in the District of Columbia, does not cover this whole provision; it comes short; and it seems to me that if a fee of $25 is to be allowed, some other guard or restriction that would be founded upon better reason ought to be provided than this distinction by territorial lines.

Mr. JACKSON. The whole subject is very difficult to deal with, and the committee in reference to that matter concluded that it was better to adopt that line of policy, if possible, in reference to the increase of fees that would transfer the business as near the pensioner's locality as possible. Of course there may be individual hardships arising under the operation of such a law, but the general principle is undoubtedly the best.

I will not take up the time of the Senate to answer the objection of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] in regard to the constitutionality of this legislation, because it is in a line with all legislation since the pension laws were adopted. This bill as now proposed is practically the act of 1870, with a single exception in reference to the $25 fee.

In regard to what was stated by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] the committee went just as far as they felt they had the power to go in annulling the act of 1884. We felt that we could not go any further than we had done, and that we had no right to do so. We could not abrogate or annul contracts entered into understandingly, voluntarily, and without fraud. That was the result of our examination.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MAJ. WILLIAM LUDLOW.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I now ask unanimous consent to have the Senate take up House joint resolution No. 309.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The Senator from Pennsylvania will suspend until the Chair lays before the Senate, or rather the Senate resumes the consideration of, the unfinished business, the Secretary informing the Chair that the unfinished business was informally laid aside.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I ask that it be laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, being the bill (H. R. 4976) for the retirement and recoinage of the trade-dollar.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I ask that that be laid aside informally to take up House joint resolution No. 309.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be informally laid aside in order that the Senate may proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 309), extending the permission granted Maj. William Ludlow by the act of February 28, 1883, to accept a civil position. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It extends for the period of one year the permission granted to Maj. William Ludlow, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, to accept a civil position in the service of the city of Philadelphia, without a forfeiture of his military commission, until the 1st day of April, 1885. By the provisions of a joint resolution approved February 28, 1883, Ludlow is not to receive from the United States any pay or allowance whatever during the period indicated.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I wish to say that Colonel Ludlow is now in the employ of the city of Philadelphia, and has charge of work now going on and which is uncompleted. The city desires to retain his services for another year, and therefore has asked that this resolution be passed by Congress. It has already passed the House, and I hope it will pass the Senate without objection.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask now that the regular business be laid aside informally in order that I may call up House bill 7857, being the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be informally laid aside in order that the Senate may proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7857) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that the first or formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with, and that the amendments may be considered as the reading progresses, and that the committee amendments may be acted on before other amendments are received and considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the first reading of the bill will be dispensed with and the bill will be read for amendment. Under the rules the committee amendments are to be first considered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 499, to insert:

Rent for consul-general at Paris: For rent, in lieu of the statutory allowance of 20 per cent. of salary, of consul-general at Paris, $2,000.

The next amendment was, after line 502, to insert:

To pay the expense of a preliminary search, to be made under the direction of the Department of State, of the records of the French prize courts from 1792 to 1801, inclusive, to ascertain whether any evidence or documents relating to the claims of American citizens for spoliations committed by the French prior to the 31st of July, 1801, still exist, and, if so, the nature and character thereof, the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, the same to be immediately available.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the chairman of the committee whether that should not be a little more comprehensive than merely to authorize the search of the records of the French prize courts? It is quite possible that the claims which were forwarded to the French Government from ours may be in the archives of their department of foreign affairs. Would it not be better to say "records of the French prize courts or other French archives," because the Department of State would see of course that the money is properly applied?

Mr. ALLISON. I will state to the Senator that we used the language of the law which provides for this search. I think it is section 5 of the act passed this year.

Mr. HOAR. Has the Senator that act?

Mr. ALLISON. I have it not with me at this moment. It is the law passed at this session.

Mr. HOAR. I will suggest the amendment—it can certainly do no harm—to insert after "prize courts," in line 505, the words "or other French archives." The Department of State will see that proper search is made.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know that there is any harm in the proposition; but that is a pretty wide authority, to search the archives of the French Government.

Mr. HOAR. But it is limited by the smallness of the appropriation, which is only $5,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I know; but I take it the French prize courts are open and their records are public documents, but the archives of the French Government may not be.

Mr. HOAR. The Department will not spend any more money than will answer the purpose under this appropriation.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; I make no objection.

Mr. HOAR. I move to amend the amendment by inserting after "courts," in line 505, the words "or other French archives."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 512, to insert:

To enable the President to meet unforeseen emergencies arising in the diplomatic and consular service, and to extend the commercial and other interests of the United States, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill has been concluded, and the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations have been disposed of.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to the class in which the consulate at Jerusalem is placed. Jerusalem, on page 14, is under class 6, at a salary of $1,500. I was about to look at the estimates of the Department. My recollection is that the Department recommends or estimates that the salary be put at $2,000. I happen to have some information about that particular consulate. There are quite a number of American citizens residing there, some of whom are American by birth and several hundred of whom are adopted citizens, with more or less of controversy from time to time.

Many hundreds of American travelers visit Jerusalem, as everybody knows, and scarcely one ever comes near to the city without sending word, perhaps in advance, to the consulate, and certainly not without calling upon the consul, asking for more or less of advice, and frequently for the company of that officer; and very naturally being invited in a great many cases to luncheon, he is involved in very considerable expense in traveling about the vicinity anywhere from one to twenty-five miles. In short, the inevitable expenses of the duties of his position, as well as the hospitalities which he can not as a gentleman shun, make a very heavy deduction from his pay.

Once this bill came here putting the consulate in the $2,000 class, and the State Department thinks it is wise and has recommended it, not at my solicitation, but of its own accord, though I was there two years ago inquiring about it. They said it was true that this consulate ought to be raised. What is left for the consul is a very small sum in this case. I do not see how any consul stationed there, except the one who is there now, could get along at all. I know him to be a scholar in Arabic, learned in the geography of the Holy Land, devoting what time he can spare to studies of all these subjects at the instance of various learned societies, the Palestine Exploration Society and others. He speaks Arabic, has the confidence of the natives about him, is a very useful and especially fitted man, and I say his net compensation is scarcely that of a laborer about this building. The reports this consul has made I happen to know, in two or three cases, have been specially commended for their value.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut make any motion?

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not know what is the usual course. I move to place the consulate at Jerusalem in class 5, at $2,000 per annum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut moves to insert in line 250, after the word "Beirut," the word "Jerusalem." That will bring it in class 5 in proper connection.

Mr. HAWLEY. I thank the Chair.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. Does that strike it out in the other place?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move to strike it out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut moves to strike out, in line 330, the word "Jerusalem."

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish the Senate to dispose of the Military Academy Appropriation bill. It will take but a moment.

Mr. MORRILL. Laying aside the unfinished business informally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks leave to make a report at this time from the Committee on Appropriations. If there be no objection the report will be received.

Mr. ALLISON. The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the action of the House of Representatives on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7577) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes, direct me to report it back with the recommendation that the Senate recede from its amendments to the House bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate recede from its amendments heretofore agreed to to this bill. The amendments will be read.

Mr. ALLISON. I will state in brief that the amendments relate to the pay of the subordinate officers at the academy. The Senate made some amendments in reference to that, but on further examination the committee has become satisfied that the House provision is correct.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 12, after the word "professors," the Senate struck out "and officers on (increased rank);" and in the same line, after the word "service," the Senate struck out "$9,525" and inserted "$8,898.50;" so as to make the clause read:

For additional pay of professors for length of service, $8,898.50.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate recede from these amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

COINAGE OF SILVER DOLLARS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4976) for the retirement and recoinage of the trade-dollar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], striking out the fifth section of the amendment reported from the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After sixteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 6 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 6, 1885.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair as Speaker pro tempore). Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

INSPECTOR of PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection the Chair will lay before the House at this time some executive communications.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, asking an appropriation to pay the salary of inspector of public buildings; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

BUREAU OF LABOR STATISTICS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimate for salaries and expenses of the Bureau of Labor Statistics for the next fiscal year; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CIVIL OFFICERS, ALASKA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from thh Secretary of the Treasury, inclosing a letter from the commissioner for Alaska, asking appropriation to pay the expenses of civil officers; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, LOUISVILLE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, inclosing a letter from the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, relative to an increase in the limit of the cost of the public building at Louisville, Ky.; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I rise to a question of personal privilege. On the 1st of January last, while the gentleman from Kentucky was occupying the floor, by his permission I interrupted him to give something of the history of the prosecution against the late Mr. Payne, of Oklahoma notoriety. After my remarks were made a gentleman on the Committee on Appropriations called and asked me to show him the remarks to which I called his attention. On reflection I came to the conclusion that one statement of fact in my remarks, found on page 904 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, was an error. I therefore addressed a letter to the district attorney of the United States for the western district of Arkansas, asking the precise status of the litigation then pending, as well as that which had been disposed of in court, and in order to correct this statement now and to lay before the people of the country at this time interested in legislation touching the Oklahoma territory I send the remarks I then made to the Clerk's desk to be read, and then will lay before the House the answer of the district attorney to my letter, which will furnish the country, and more particularly those States surrounding the Indian Territory, with the exact status of that Oklahoma territory at this time as determined by the courts.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I am compelled to make the point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And the Chair is bound to sustain the point of order, because the gentleman from Arkansas does not state anything in the nature of a question of personal privilege.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I desire simply to correct an error in my remarks made in the House at that time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman desires to correct the RECORD, he will proceed, and the correction will be made accordingly, as that is a privileged question. But the gentleman proposes to correct an error of his own and not an error of the RECORD.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I have no objection to the gentleman making the correction he desires; my point of order is made entirely in the interest of the public business.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection, as the letter I send up to the Clerk's desk to be read will make the proper correction.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. It is not a correction of the RECORD, but a correction of the gentleman's own statement.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I did not hear the gentleman's last remark.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I say that it is not a correction of the RECORD, but a correction of some previous statement which the gentleman has had put upon the RECORD.

Now I make this objection in the very best of faith, because I desire to save the time of the House and to get on with the public business now before us. I have uniformly interposed these objections, and certainly with no ill-feeling toward any gentleman here upon the floor.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Let me make two suggestions to the gentleman from Indiana: First, as a member of this House, if I have inadvertently made a statement which I have found afterward to be not correct, it occurs to me that I should, under the rules of the House, have a right to make the correction.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair must interpose and sustain the point of order of the gentleman from Indiana. The Chair does not think that the gentleman from Arkansas has stated a proposition which embodies a question of personal privilege. His proposition, as the Chair understands it, is simply to correct a statement of his own which appears in the RECORD, and the correctness of the RECORD in regard to the statement is not questioned. It is only a correction of what the gentleman has himself placed in the RECORD, and in the opinion of the Chair does not constitute a question of privilege.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Then I will ask the gentleman from Indiana to withdraw the point of order and allow this letter to be printed in the RECORD for the information of the House.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to by Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, is as follows:

OFFICE OF UNITED STATES DISTRICT ATTORNEY,
Fort Smith, Ark., February 1, 1885.

DEAR JUDGE: Your favor of the 28th ultimo, relating to the Payne cases, is duly received. Payne was not convicted under a criminal statute, but at the time of his death there was a criminal suit pending against him for introducing spirituous liquor into the Indian country. There was also at that time a civil prosecution pending against him for the enforcement of a penal statute against intruders in the Indian country (R. S., secs. 2147 and 2148). Prior to this time two other civil suits for the enforcement of this penal statute had already gone to judgment, one at the term preceding Payne's death and the other some two or three years before. The first of these suits was hotly contested, prominent lawyers from Saint Louis being sent here to argue it.

The way the criminal proceeding came to be instituted was because at the time of Payne's last arrest he pointed out to the officers some whisky which he said he had introduced and that he defied the Government to proceed against him for that; that in such a proceeding the question would be directly raised as to whether the country he and his followers were settling was in the Indian country. When he was brought here, and I was informed of this matter, I concluded to accommodate him, and filed the information charging him with the introduction. He then made an application to the court for a continuance of the case on the ground of an absent witness by whom he alleged he could prove that he did not bring the whisky in, but that it was brought in by another. I had announced myself ready for trial, and was perfectly willing to try the issue in that way. The case was continued on his motion.

This suit, together with the third and last civil action, abated at his death.

At the time the last civil suit was brought against Payne, there were suits of the same character brought against each of some twelve or fourteen of his followers. These have all gone to judgment within the last few days.

Very respectfully,

WM. H. H. CLAYTON.

Hon. J. H. ROGERS, Washington, D. C.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule the Chair will now entertain motions to take up bills and resolutions for consideration, the hour beginning at twenty-five minutes past 12 o'clock.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I desire to know whether under the rule recently adopted the Chair will hold that the first business in order to-day is not the consideration of the Private Calendar; whether, in other words, the special rule of the House will supersede the order of business on Fridays?

KATHERINE B. C. MERRILL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the rule of the House is imperative, and that the first business in order is the unfinished business coming over from yesterday morning under this special rule, the bill called up by the gentleman from Louisiana, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the claim of Katherine C. B. Merrill, executrix of the last will and testament of Ayers P. Merrill, deceased, and late of the State of Mississippi, for quartermaster and commissary stores and supplies alleged to have been taken and used by the United States Army, during the rebellion, from the plantations of said Merrill, in the vicinity of Natchez, Miss., be referred to the Quartermaster-General, who shall investigate the justice and legality of said claim, and report the amount and value of said stores and supplies taken and used by the Army of the United States, and also what amount has been paid on the same; and that he report all the facts and evidence for the consideration of Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk had begun the reading of the report accompanying this bill on yesterday when the hour expired. The reading of the report will now be concluded.

The report (by Mr. GEORGE) is as follows:

That in 1863 the United States forces at and near Natchez, Miss., took from plantations of Ayres P. Merrill, deceased, the testator of claimants, a large amount of commissary and quartermaster supplies. The proof has been made by the affidavit of a large number of colored witnesses, who were the slaves of said Merrill. Some of these plantations were situated in Mississippi and some in Louisiana, all being near the city of Natchez. The proof is not of a very satisfactory character as to the amount. It is also singular that no vouchers were given, as Ayres P. Merrill was a man of known loyalty, possessing the confidence of General Grant, General Gresham, General Smith, General Crocker, General Ransom, and Commodore Greer, as shown by letters of all these to him, written about the time the supplies were taken. It seems certain, however, that a considerable amount of supplies was received and used by the United States Army.

Ayres P. Merrill died several years ago. He was a very old and infirm man for several years prior to his death, paying little attention to business.

It is possible that some, if not all, these supplies have been paid for, but if so, the vouchers will be found in the proper Department.

Under all the circumstances the committee deem it proper to recommend the passage of a bill referring the claim to the Quartermaster-General, with instructions to inquire into and ascertain the full amount of supplies so taken and used by the United States Army, and to ascertain what amount, if any, has been paid on the same, and report the facts to Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule, five minutes remain for debate in opposition to the bill.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I understand from the last portion of the bill that this proposes only to have the facts stated to another Congress.

Mr. KING. That is all.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unless some gentlemen desire to debate the bill the Chair will put the question.

Mr. STEELE. I would like to have this bill again read.

The bill was again reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KING moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHARLES MURPHY.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I ask consent to take up House bill 6531, for the relief of Charles Murphy, withdraw it from the files, and substitute in lieu thereof a new bill, changing the nature of the recommendation of the committee from an appropriation simply to the privilege of going into the Court of Claims to have the case considered. I apprehend that there is no necessity for an argument in support of that proposition. I desire to say in a word simply——

Mr. KEIFER. The bill has not been read yet.

Mr. PRICE. Suppose I state what it is first.

Several MEMBERS. Let the bill be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute for House bill 6531——

Mr. KEIFER (interrupting the reading). Is this a bill from one of the Calendars?

Mr. PRICE. The bill is on the Calendar and was reported by a committee, and I am seeking now by authority of the entire committee to have this modification made.

Mr. KEIFER. I understand then that it is a bill reported by a committee and on the Calendar?

Mr. PRICE. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the bill H. R. 6531, to which the gentleman refers, is upon the Calendar, and under the rule can be called up; but the bill sent to the desk by the gentleman from Wisconsin is not upon the Calendar, and in the judgment of the Chair is not covered by the rule.

Mr. PRICE. If the gentleman from Ohio had permitted me to proceed, as I was in order proceeding, there would have been no objection interposed to the proposition I was about to make.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule the bill must be reported by the Clerk before the debate can be had.

Mr. KEIFER. I only insisted upon the bill being read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will inform the gentleman from Wisconsin, however, that the bill sent to the desk is not, in the judgment of the Chair, covered by this rule.

Mr. RANDALL. The only way to get it before the House as a substitute bill is to call up the original bill and amend it by the substitute.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize gentlemen as soon as order is restored so that the Chair may hear them. The House will be in order. The gentleman from Kentucky rises to a question of order. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE], as I understand, has been recognized under the rule. Under a misapprehension that he could present a substitute for a bill on the Calendar he has sent up a bill for the consideration of the House which has been ruled out very properly by the Speaker. I raise this question of order, whether if the gentlemen were to call up for consideration the bill on the Calendar it would then be proper for him to move to amend it as he suggests?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair answers that it would.

Mr. MCMILLIN. That is what the gentleman from Wisconsin indicates his desire to do.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentlemen from Wisconsin has not lost his right in any way.

Mr. PRICE. I am infinitely obliged to gentlemen who take care of my interests. But they will permit me to state that I think I can do so myself. My desire was that the original bill should be read, and then that this should be offered as a substitute.

Mr. KEIFER. We must proceed under the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill as it appears on the Calendar.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6531) for the relief of Charles Murphy.

Be it enacted, &c., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $42,834 to Charles Murphy, as balance due said Charles Murphy for work done and damages sustained by him growing out of or arising from his contract with the United States Government to excavate a dry-dock at Mare Island, in the State of California.

Mr. PRICE. I now desire to offer a substitute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill is not yet before the House for consideration. It will be in order to offer the substitute if the bill shall not be objected to by the number of members required under the rule. The gentleman is entitled to be heard for five minutes.

Mr. PRICE. I desire to state the substance of the bill. Last April the Committee on Claims, after months of close investigation, reported a bill back to this House with the recommendation that Charles Murphy be paid $42,000 for certain work done for the Government in 1873 at Mare Island, California. A minority of the committee disagreed, and said the amount should be $92,000. Now that bill is on the Calendar, and the committee have instructed me, in accordance with the wishes of Mr. Murphy and his friends, to report a substitute, not giving him a cent, but simply waiving the statute of limitations and under certain conditions sending the claim again to the Court of Claims to be adjudicated upon. That is the substance of the bill which I ask this House now to pass.

Mr. WASHBURN. You want it sent to the Court of Claims?

Mr. PRICE. Yes, sir. The new bill simply provides the case shall go to the Court of Claims to be adjudicated on its merits under certain conditions named in the bill. On the part of the entire committee I submit this bill and ask its passage as a substitute for the original bill. A gentleman near me suggests that it be read as a part of my remarks; and in that connection I desire to submit also the report in favor of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has but two minutes of his time remaining. The substitute which he proposes will be read as a part of his remarks.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the claim of Charles Murphy be remanded to the Court of Claims for a further hearing upon the testimony and papers formerly heard in said court, and upon such further testimony relative to his acceptance of the award under protest, including the claimant's evidence, as either party may file, pursuant to the rules of the court; and said court, in addition to the authority conferred upon it by existing laws, shall have equitable jurisdiction of all matters presented by the claimant in his new petition, to be filed within sixty days from the approval of this act; and said court is authorized and directed speedily to render judgment for such amount as right and justice may demand, without reference to any statutes of limitation, and with legal interest from the time his cause of action accrued; and furthermore, an appeal shall lie from such judgment to the Supreme Court of the United States, by either party, upon the entire record considered in the Court of Claims.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unless some gentleman desires to occupy the time allowed for opposition the Chair will now call for objections.

Mr. COSGROVE. I wish to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin a question. Has not this claim been already before the Court of Claims?

Mr. PRICE. The bill itself says so. It was once superficially tried before the Court of Claims. Additional evidence since obtained shows it was not tried on its merits; and we desire to send it back to the Court of Claims for a further hearing.

Mr. COSGROVE. What was the result when the case was formerly tried before the Court of Claims?

Mr. PRICE. It was adverse to the claimant.

Mr. RANDALL. Was there an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. PRICE. There was an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States on the record made, but no part of the testimony introduced went to the Supreme Court.

Mr. RANDALL. Did the Supreme Court affirm the judgment of the Court of Claims?

Mr. PRICE. The absence of the evidence was fatal, all the evidence not having been before the Court of Claims.

Mr. COSGROVE. Was the question of the statutes of limitation raised?

Mr. PRICE. No, sir.

Mr. COSGROVE. On what point of fact or of law was the decision based?

Mr. PRICE. It is all right. No one can be wrong in supporting this bill. The court had no evidence before them at all; absolutely none.

A MEMBER. Whose fault was that? Was it the fault of the Government?

Mr. PRICE. I do not say it was the Government's fault, but it would be the fault of the Government now if it did not give this claimant an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. COSGROVE. I understand from the gentleman from Wisconsin that this case has been before the Court of Claims, and he states the evidence in the possession of the claimant was not all adduced before the court when the case was tried. And upon that the Court of Claims decided against the claimant, and after that an appeal was taken from the judgment of the Court of Claims to the Supreme Court of the United States, and in the Supreme Court the judgment of the Court of Claims was affirmed.

Mr. PRICE. Will the gentleman permit me to answer him?

Mr. COSGROVE. Yes, I will permit the gentleman to answer.

Mr. PRICE. The gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN ALSTYNE] understands the case and he will answer the gentleman.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. Mr. Speaker, as I understand the history of this case, it is after this wise——

Mr. RANDALL. The time for advocacy of the bill has expired.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time now being consumed is that in opposition to the bill. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COSGROVE] yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN ALSTYNE]?

Mr. COSGROVE. I yield one minute.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. The case was this: There was a legitimate subsisting claim in behalf of Murphy against the Government by reason of the interference of the Government in the performance of the work which he had agreed to do. He applied for payment, and part payment was made. He protested against accepting the sum in satisfaction of his legitimate claim. He was forced to go to the Court of Claims to get redress. There the fact that he had received this money was put in proof by the Government, and when he offered to show that he had accepted it under protest, and had refused to take it in full satisfaction of his claim, that evidence was objected to by the Government and excluded by the Court of Claims.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COSGROVE] has two minutes left.

Mr. COSGROVE. I will give the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN ALSTYNE] another half a minute of my time.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. The claimant excepted. The finding of the court was against Murphy. He took an appeal. The error-book did not show that he had ever offered any proof whatever that he had accepted under protest the amount which he had received in part payment, and in the absence of that proof the judgment of the Court of Claims was affirmed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri (to Mr. VAN ALSTYNE). It is all right, is it not?

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. It is all right.

Mr. COSGROVE. Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that if this gentleman received this money under protest he should not have given a receipt for it, unless he gave one specifying that the money was accepted under protest. If I understand correctly the statement of the gentleman from New York, this gentleman receipted for this money without making any protest in writing, although he may have had a mental reservation on the subject which I do not understand to be a protest or equivalent to a protest.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. My recollection is that the protest was in writing, but not in the same paper in which he had receipted for the money, and he proved by two witnesses who were at the time in the service of the Government that he he had accepted the money under protest and that it was so understood.

Mr. COSGROVE. If that fact was before the court the evidence of it was there, as a matter of course.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. The voucher did not show it.

Mr. COSGROVE. The gentleman states that the voucher was given in evidence before the Court of Claims, and I understand him to claim now, as matter of fact, that that voucher did show that this man had received the money under protest. If that evidence was before the Court of Claims how could it have happened that it was not considered?

Mr. PRICE. I will state to the gentleman that it was not considered.

Mr. COSGROVE. Well, the voucher ought to show the fact, if it was a fact.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time for debate on both sides is exhausted. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. RANDALL. There is objection.

Mr. WELLER. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The requisite number of members objected to the consideration of the bill, and it was laid aside.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the report in relation to this case may be printed in the RECORD with the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to granting the request of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE], and it is so ordered.

The report (by Mr. PRICE) is as follows:

On January 7, 1884, Charles Murphy presented to the House his petition for relief. He asked to be paid for excavating the pit of the dry-dock at Mare Island, California, and for damages that he sustained while performing that work, owing to a failure by agents of the Government to carry out its contract with him in good faith, whereby he was forced into insolvency, and lost all his property at sheriff's sale, valued at $19,200.

Your committee had printed, in report No. 483, the testimony in his case, and on April 11, 1884, it submitted a unanimous report, No. 1242, recommending the payment to Charles Murphy of $42,834 for work done upon said excavation, and bill H. R. 6531 accompanied that report.

A minority (of four) of your committee found that Murphy is entitled to $49,732 damages, and recommended that much additional payment to him, or a total payment of $92,566.

But the Senate Committee on Claims reported adversely upon Murphy's petition (report No. 997). It took the ground that having had an adverse decision upon his case in the Court of Claims and in the Supreme Court of the United States, Murphy is not entitled to any relief. It therefore becomes inexpedient to consider further the bill (H. R. 6531) which provides for the appropriation of $42,834.

Since the adverse action of the Senate committee Charles Murphy had introduced into both Houses of Congress, on the same day (bills H. R. 8112 and S. 2583), a measure to allow him to go before the Court of Claims for a new trial.

On February 4, 1885, the Senate committee agreed to report adversely upon said measure. But your committee, notwithstanding, recommends that Charles Murphy be granted a new trial in the Court of Claims for the following reasons:

First. The Court of Claims rendered an adverse judgment to Murphy (14 Court of Claims Reports, page 508), conformably to an award made by a single arbitrator, appointed solely by the Secretary of the Navy, without the consent or agreement of Murphy.

Second. The Court of Claims held that Murphy accepted the award without objection, and solely upon that ground the Supreme Court affirmed the judgment of the Court of Claims. (14 Otto, page 464.)

Upon a motion for a new trial in the Court of Claims evidence of two witnesses was taken, which shows that Murphy strongly protested against accepting the award in satisfaction of his claim. The Court, in its decision refusing a new trial, recited in substance the evidence of the witnesses. (15 Court of Claims Reports, page 217.) But this decision and evidence were withheld from the Supreme Court, as appears from a statement made to your committee by Hon. WILLIAM S. ROSECRANS, a member of this House. Besides, this decision does not form a part of the transcript of the record which went before the Supreme Court. (Bound Transcripts, 1881, page 13776.)

For this reason alone your committee recommend that Murphy be accorded a new trial, inasmuch as Murphy was unfairly beaten in the Supreme Court.

Third. The Court of Claims has abandoned its doctrine as to receipts in full in cases of protest as pronounced in Murphy's case, and has held, in the case of the Cape Ann Granite Company, decided this present year, that when a party protests against giving a receipt in full, the receipt will go for only so much money paid on account.

Fourth. Congress has heretofore given just and ample relief in face of adverse decisions by the courts.

PRECEDENTS, MURPHY'S CASE, AMENDMENT A.

1. Samuel J. Hensly: Adverse decision in Court of Claims; paid $96,375 by act of June 9, 1860. (12 Statutes, 847.)

2. David C. Myer: Adverse report Court of Claims; paid $30,000 by act of June 16, 1860. (12 Statutes, 861.)

3. Heirs Stephen Johnston: Court commanded to try the case again; to allow value of his land, with interest, from February 2, 1841; act February 9, 1863. (12 Statutes, 915.)

4. Alex. Cross: Court of Claims commanded to hear case again, by act July 2, 1864, 13 Statutes, 591; it gave him judgment for $43,607.63. (1 C. C. Reports, 347.)

5. Samuel Norris: Case sent back to Court of Claims for examination and allowance; act June 22, 1866. (14 Statutes, 608.)

6. Rich'd W. Meade: Court was instructed to hear case over by act July 25, 1866. (14 Statutes, 611.)

7. Arthur Edwards et al.: Bill passed for further relief in court; vetoed by President Buchanan April 17, 1860. (Senate Journal, first session Thirty-sixth Congress, page 406.)

8. Battle and Evans: Court of Claims directed to hear case a second time; act of April 5, 1872. (17 Statutes, 651.)

9. Theodore Adams: Supreme Court decided against him (7 Wallace, 463); paid $112,740.76, by act January 20, 1873 (17 Statutes, 713), and Congress was so delicate about reversing the United States Supreme Court that it had no report made on the bill either by a Senate or House committee.

10. Lydia R. Shreve: Adverse judgment in Court of Claims; paid $50,000, act January 13, 1881. (21 Statutes, 602.)

11. Heirs of the brig General Armstrong: Adverse judgment in Court of Claims; paid by Secretary of State under act May 1, 1882, $70,739. (22 Statutes, 697.)

12. A. Grant: Adverse decision in Court of Claims; Congress ordered the court to try it over; act January 5, 1883 (22 Statutes, 750); judgment for $14,016.29.

For these reasons your committee earnestly recommend the passage of the accompanying bill in justice to the claimant, who has a most meritorious claim. And its former report, No. 1242, is appended hereunto, in order that the evidence in this case may be available to the House.

WEHRLE, WERK & SON.

Mr. HURD. I call up the bill (H. R. 7496) for the relief of Wehrle, Werk & Son.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to abate internal-revenue taxes to the amount of $461.87 illegally assessed against Wehrle, Werke & Son, in the year 1876, for spirits distilled in the year 1875.

Mr. HURD. I ask for the reading of the report.

The Clerk read the report (by Mr. HERBERT), as follows:

In 1875 Wehrle, Werk & Son were engaged in the business of fruit distillers at Middlebar's Island, Ottawa County, Ohio, and in the tenth internal-revenue district of said State. On the 22d of June, 1876, said firm was assessed an internal-revenue tax of $583.37 upon a deficiency in the production of distilled spirits for the month of June, 1875, which they allege was erroneous and unjust.

In the survey of the fruit distillery of said firm, made on January 2, 1875, the brandy-producing capacity thereof from sour wine in twenty-four hours was placed at 373.55 proof gallons, and the number of gallons of sour wine required to produce one gallon of proof brandy was stated to be 5.35. Said survey also stated the number of boilings capable of being made in twenty-four hours to be nine. This was the survey under which the distillery was run at the time the deficiency occurred, upon which the tax sought to be abated was placed.

This survey was erroneous. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in a letter of February 4, 1879, to Hon. Charles Foster, says:

"It would be more in harmony with the surveys in other districts if the number of boilings were reduced to seven, and the quantity of sour wine required for a gallon of spirits increased to seven gallons. If the survey had been so made the daily producing capacity for sour wine would be 219.97 gallons, instead of 373.53 gallons."

The Commissioner recommends relief for petitioners from $461.87 of said tax.

Your committee find that petitioners had never distilled brandy from wine before the survey was made, and had no means of knowing that the survey was erroneous until actual experiment. They ran the still for fifty-one hours only, and as soon as the error was discovered reported the product to the proper officers and paid the tax as assessed.

The committee find that there was no neglect on the part of the petitioners in this connection, and recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. HURD. Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to the report except to say that these parties were ignorant of this business until the survey had been made by the Government officer. The mistake was made in making the capacity of the still one hundred and fifty gallons more a day than it could possibly produce. After trying the capacity of the still for fifty-one hours they discovered the error and made a claim for abatement. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue at the time recommended the abatement, and four Committees of Ways and Means have reported in favor of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. As I understand the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] this abatement has been recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HURD. By the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD], who is a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, how many cases similar to this are before that committee, and whether the passage of this bill will not be a precedent for many large claims on the ground that the distilleries were not accurately surveyed at some time remote in the past. I remember that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] urged the passage of a bill something like this.

Mr. HOLMAN. And it was passed.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Yes, it was passed—very improperly, I think.

Mr. HURD. The Committee on Ways and Means has had a number of cases before it, but this is about the only one recommended, because these parties discovered the error within a few hours after commencing to work the distillery, and they quit work. The case is exceptional in that regard.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the House. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, have objections been asked for?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair asked for objections, and none were made.

Mr. PRICE. I have been listening very intently and patiently to hear the invitation for objections, because I wanted to enter my protest against this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair asked for objections, and after waiting, announced that none were heard.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HURD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ERNEST H. WARDWELL.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I ask that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3236) for the relief of Ernest H. Wardwell, and that the House now proceed to consider the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to pay to Ernest H. Wardwell, of Garrett County, Maryland, late a captain and assistant quartermaster of United States volunteers, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the pay and allowances of a captain and assistant quartermaster in the United States Army from the 11th day of March to the 18th day of May, 1865; and also the three months' additional pay proper as first lieutenant and regimental quartermaster of the Second Regiment North Carolina Union Volunteers (white), the same as allowed to all volunteer officers under the act of Congress approved March 3, 1865.

Mr. MCCOMAS. The report in this case, which is by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LYMAN], is so clear and explicit, that if members of the House will only listen to it, I think there can not be ingenuity enough to find ground of objection to this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the report be read.

The report (by Mr. LYMAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred bill H. R. 3236, beg leave to submit the following report:

Ernest H. Wardwell, in May, 1861, enlisted in the Sixth Massachusetts Volunteers, and served for more than three months without pay. On September 7 of the same year he enlisted as a private in the Twenty-sixth Massachusetts Volunteers. November 8, 1862, he was commissioned second lieutenant Second Louisiana (Union) Volunteers. April 4, 1863, he resigned on account of sickness. February 5, 1864, he was commissioned first lieutenant and quartermaster Second North Carolina (Union) Volunteers. February 23, 1865, he was mustered out to accept a commission which had been promised him as captain and assistant quartermaster, in which grade he was confirmed by the Senate March 11, 1865. His commission, dated April 15, 1865, was forwarded to him May 11, and was accepted May 18. He was honorably mustered out of service July 28, 1865.

From this record it appears that Captain Wardwell had an honorable though not continuous service of over three years.

He claims that he should receive pay from March 11, 1865, to May 18, 1865, and also three months' extra pay under the act of March 3, 1865.

There was a certain delay between March 11, 1865, when Captain Wardwell was confirmed by the Senate, and May 11, when his commission was sent to him. For this period of delay he thinks he ought to receive the pay of his rank, because he resigned his lieutenantcy to accept the commission of captain which had been promised him, and was present and ready to receive his commission at the date of his confirmation. It appears, however, that in addition to the time usually required for the making out and signature of the commission, there was a further delay caused by the assassination of President Lincoln, April 14. By law and regulations an officer does not begin to draw pay until he has received and accepted his commission and taken the oath. Unfortunate circumstances caused a delay of some weeks to Captain Wardwell in the receipt of his commission, and it seems not unreasonable to allow him pay during this period of waiting, because he resigned his lieutenantcy on the positive information that he had been appointed a captain, and he was present and ready to assume his new duties.

The act of March 3, 1865, grants three months' extra pay to officers then in commission and who should continue in service to the close of the war. Captain Wardwell was mustered out February 23, 1865, and was not confirmed by the Senate as captain till March 11, and only accepted his commission on the 18th of May, so that he was not in service on the 3d of March, 1865, and could not legally draw the three months' extra pay.

But as Captain Wardwell, after being in the Army nearly three years, resigned for the sole purpose of receiving his new commission, and was present and ready to be mustered in under it, he may not improperly be considered as constructively in the service on the 3d of March, 1865, and therefore entitled to three months' extra pay.

The committee, therefore, report that the bill should pass.

Mr. BEACH. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS] whether the general act passed in the last Congress does not cover this case?

Mr. MCCOMAS. No, sir; it does not.

Mr. BEACH. One additional inquiry: How much money will this bill take out of the Treasury?

Mr. MCCOMAS. The extra pay of this officer for three months.

Mr. BEACH. What will that amount to?

Mr. MCCOMAS. A few hundred dollars; I have forgotten the exact amount. But under the bill this officer will simply receive the three months' pay which every other officer received. This officer was promoted, and while waiting to receive his commission, which was accidentally delayed, he was mustered out, and in this way deprived by a technical rule of the extra pay which all other officers received. He was promoted, and his promotion was confirmed by the Senate, but his commission went by mistake to Oakland, Cal., instead of Oakland, Md.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MCCOMAS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ALFRED G. HATFIELD.

Mr. WALLACE. I desire to call up from the Speaker's table for present consideration the bill (S. 295) for the relief of Alfred G. Hatfield.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay Alfred G. Hatfield, the legal representative of John Hatfield, deceased, late veterinary surgeon of the Thirteenth Pennsylvania Cavalry, the sum of $675, in full for services as veterinary surgeon for said regiment for nine months, at $75 per month.

Mr. RANDALL. Is there a report accompanying this bill?

Mr. WALLACE. I ask the Clerk to read the report of the Committee on War Claims upon a House bill similar to this bill of the Senate.

The report (by Mr. GEDDES) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1368) for the relief of Alfred G. Hatfield, having considered the same and accompanying papers, submit the following report:

The committee find the facts to be as stated in House report No. 1682, Forty-seventh Congress, first session, which said report is hereto annexed and made a part of this report, and is as follows:

"The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Alfred G. Hatfield, with accompanying documents, respectfully report:

"The petitioner is a citizen of the United States and a resident of the District of Columbia. He claims relief as the son and only heir at law of John Hatfield, who died in the city of Washington in the year 1874.

"It appears from the papers referred with the bill that on or about the 1st day of June, 1862, John Hatfield was employed by James A. Gallagher, then colonel commanding the Thirteenth Pennsylvania Cavalry Volunteers, in the military service of the Government of the United States, to act as veterinary surgeon for said regiment. At the time of the employment of John Hatfield by Colonel Gallagher veterinary surgeons were not allowed by law; but from affidavits of officers of the regiment and others it appears that the necessity existed for the employment of one. There were eight or nine hundred horses in the regiment, and many of them were affected with distemper and other diseases, and required the care and skill of a competent veterinary surgeon. John Hatfield, as such, had charge of all the horses of said regiment, under instructions from and the authority of Colonel Gallagher, from the date of his employment as aforesaid until the 3d day of March, 1863, a period of nine months, and he was paid nothing for his services rendered during that time, although the promise of pay was often repeated by Colonel Gallagher.

"From papers on file in the War Department it appears that John Hatfield, in December, 1863, presented his claim for recognition and pay as veterinary surgeon for nine months; that he had acted as such under the authority of Colonel Gallagher. There was then no law authorizing the employment of veterinary surgeons, and his claim was properly rejected; but on a review of the facts a warrant as veterinary surgeon was issued in his favor January 2, 1864, to date March 3, 1863, the date veterinary surgeons were authorized by law. From the 3d of March, 1863, until he was discharged he received $75 per month, that being the compensation for veterinary surgeons provided by the act of Congress approved on the said 3d day of March, 1862, known as the 'enrollment act.' But it being clear that he rendered valuable and efficient services during the nine months he acted under the authority of Colonel Gallagher, saving the Government from great loss, and that the necessity existed for his employment, your committee are of opinion that he should be paid a reasonable compensation therefor, and we are further of opinion that $75 per month is fair and reasonable.

"The committee therefor report the accompanying bill, appropriating the sum of $675, and recommend its passage."

The committee therefore adopt said House report as the report of this committee, and report the accompanying bill (H. R. 1968) for his relief, with recommendation that it pass.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill when the application in this case was first made.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not know when it was first made. This bill has been passed by the Senate.

Mr. MCMILLIN. During this Congress?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, sir; at the last session. In this House a bill precisely similar has been referred to the Committee on War Claims and reported unanimously.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I would like to know how it happened that the man who actually did this service lived nine or ten years after the war closed without making application to Congress for relief. But ten years after his death his legal representative comes and asks relief.

Mr. WALLACE. I ask that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] make a statement about that matter.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The gentleman from Ohio says that he does not remember. Now that is a material inquiry.

Mr. WALLACE. The bill has been here for some time.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Is there any proof that this claim was presented in the lifetime of the deceased?

Mr. WALLACE. I am unable to inform the gentleman.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I do not see anything in the report to that effect, nor is there any indication that it ever was presented in the lifetime of the deceased. The colonel commanding the regiment of course could not have supposed he had any authority under the law to employ such veterinary surgeon, and, of course, this man could not have served there for nine months without seeing other men receiving pay when he received none and he must have known there was no authority of law for his employment.

Mr. WALLACE. In answer to the gentleman from Tennessee I will say this: The gentleman was employed by the colonel commanding the Thirteenth Pennsylvania Cavalry Volunteers in the military service of the Government of the United States to act as veterinary surgeon for such regiment after the regiment was organized and before the law was passed under which he could be paid. He was employed for nine months before an act of Congress was passed providing for his payment. That act authorized the payment to him of $75 per month for the previous nine months when he served faithfully and efficiently as a veterinary surgeon, and when he received no pay. This bill has been introduced in order to make provision for his payment.

Mr. MCMILLIN. But the point I make is, there was no law to pay him, no authority of law for his appointment, and there was no reason why the colonel commanding every cavalry regiment in the service could not have made a similar appointment and given rise to a similar claim.

Mr. WALLACE. According to the proof, this man rendered very efficient service as a veterinary surgeon. The claim was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and that committee reported in its favor.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The point I make is that it is against public policy to allow any such claims where appointments have been made without authority of law. The man who remains in service when he knows there is no authority of law for his employment has no right to bring in any claim here against the Government, and especially so long as the service is rendered.

Mr. WALLACE. The papers were presented to the War Department in 1863.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I see that in the report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time allowed for debate has expired. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Those who object to the consideration of the bill will rise. [After a pause.] More than a sufficient number have arisen, and the bill therefore is not before the House.

REGULATION OF STEAM-BOILERS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I call up for consideration the bill (S. 1793) to amend section 4434 of title 52 of the Revised Statutes of the United States concerning commerce and navigation and the regulation of steam-vessels, with an amendment reported from the Committee on Commerce of this House.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 4434 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended by adding thereto a proviso, so that the section will read as follows:

"SEC. 4434. No boiler to which the heat is applied to the outside of the shell thereof shall be constructed of iron or steel plates of more than twenty-six one-hundredths of an inch in thickness, the ends or heads of the boilers only excepted; and every such boiler employed on steam vessels navigating rivers flowing into the Gulf of Mexico, or their tributaries, shall have not less than three inches space between and around its internal flues: Provided, That boilers to which the heat is applied to the outside of the shell thereof may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, be authorized and used on steam vessels navigating the Atlantic or Pacific Oceans, or salt-water bays or sounds, or the great lakes, or any of them, or waters flowing to and from the same, or any of them; when constructed of iron or steel plates not exceeding fifty one-hundredths of an inch in thickness."

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 17, page 2, after the word "sounds," insert the words "or the great lakes, or any of them, and waters flowing to and from the same, or any of them."

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the law at the present time provides that no boiler to which the heat is applied to the outside of the shell thereof shall be constructed of iron or steel plates of more than twenty-six one-hundredths of an inch in thickness. This bill amends the present law by providing that boilers to which the heat is applied to the outside of the shell thereof may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, be authorized and used in steam vessels navigating the Atlantic or Pacific Oceans, or salt-water bays or sounds, or the great lakes, or any of them, or the waters flowing to and from the same, when constructed of iron or steel plates not exceeding fifty one-hundredths of an inch in thickness.

It has passed the Senate; has come to the House; has been reported back from the Committee on Commerce unanimously to the House; has the approval of the board of supervising inspectors of steam-boilers; is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury, and is required for the purpose of passing some of the boilers used on the larger vessels of the country.

I reserve the remainder of my five minutes until I can hear from the other side.

Mr. WELLER. Let the report be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The report can be read, but it will come out of the time allowed for debate in opposition.

Mr. BAYNE. Why is this amendment required?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The amendment is required to pass the inspection of boilers for the waters of the great lakes which were left out of the Senate bill. Senator CONGER, of Michigan, called the attention of the committee of the House to the fact that the amendment ought to be included in any legislation to take place, as the waters of the lakes are clean in every respect.

Mr. WELLER. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report of the committee was read, as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1793) to amend section 4434 of title 52 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning commerce and navigation and the regulation of steam vessels, which bill passed the Senate of the United States December 18, 1884, having considered the same, respectfully report:

That the Senate bill do pass with the following amendment:

In line 17, page 2, after the word "sounds," insert the words "or the great lakes, or any of them, and waters flowing to and from the same, or any of them;" so that the said bill shall read, when amended, as follows:

"An act to amend section 4434 of title 52 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning commerce and navigation and the regulation of steam vessels.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 4434 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended by adding thereto a proviso, so that the section will read as follows:

"SECTION 4434. No boiler to which the heat is applied to the outside of the shell thereof shall be constructed of iron or steel plates of more than twenty-six one-hundredths of an inch in thickness, the ends or heads of the boilers only excepted; and every such boiler employed on steam vessels navigating rivers flowing into the Gulf of Mexico, or their tributaries, shall have not less than three inches space between and around its internal flues: Provided, That boilers to which the heat is applied to the outside of the shell thereof may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, be authorized and used on steam vessels navigating the Atlantic or Pacific Oceans, or salt-water bays or sounds, or the great lakes, or any of them, or the waters flowing to or from the same, or any of them, when constructed of iron or steel plates not exceeding fifty one-hundredths of an inch in thickness.'"

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to be heard for the remainder of the time?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I do not, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, the amendment agreed to, and the bill as amended ordered to be read the third time; and being read the third time, was passed.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to

CHRISTIAN BROTHERS' COLLEGE, SAINT LOUIS, MO.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up House bill 6881, on the Private Calendar, for the relief of the trustees of the Christian Brothers' College, of Saint Louis, Mo., and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there be paid to the trustees of the Christian Brothers' College, of Saint Louis, in the State of Missouri, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $35,000, in full compensation for the use and occupation of the buildings and lands of said college during the late war by the United States troops, and for injury to and destruction of property belonging to said trustees by said troops.

The committee recommend, in line 6, to strike out "thirty-five" and insert "twenty."

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I ask to have the report read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report.

Mr. MORSE (interrupting the reading). I move to dispense with the further reading of the report.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent that its further reading be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unless some gentleman desires to debate the bill the Chair will call for objections.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, and Mr. BENNETT. Let the report be read.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the report.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania (after the reading had proceeded for some time). I think the House is satisfied so far as the report is concerned, and I ask that its further reading be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama and the gentleman from North Carolina demanded the reading of the report.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I withdraw the demand.

Mr. BENNETT. I ask that it be read.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the report (submitted by Mr. STORM). It is as follows:

Prior to the recent rebellion the College of the Christian Brothers of Saint Louis, Mo., was a large, well-appointed, and flourishing institution, being 200 feet long by 60 feet in width, with a wing attached 130 feet by 40 feet, and four stories high, and devoted to the education of youth in all the practical departments of knowledge. Its pupils, drawn from all sections of the United States, numbered about five hundred on an average. From this large patronage the college derived its revenue, and upon this it depended for the maintenance of its corps of instructors and the procurement of all its needed educational facilities. That soon after the commencement of hostilities McDowell's College, immediately adjoining the College of the Christian Brothers, was occupied by the Union forces as a military prison; that the occupancy of the former building for the purpose of a military prison made it necessary and convenient for Union forces to occupy a portion of the latter building, with all the grounds belonging thereto. This occupation, commencing in 1861, continued for four years.

The effect of such occupancy upon the school was, as might have been expected, fatal. The preservation of discipline among the students was impossible; the noise and distractions of the camp put an end to study and scholastic exercises, and the voice of collegiate authority was silenced amid the din of arms. The well-worn legal maxim can be easily changed to meet the result in this case: Inter arma silent musæ. Within one year the attendance diminished to one hundred pupils, and at the close of the war but a small fraction of this number remained.

The common use by the soldiers of the halls and rooms for so long a period of time was attended by great damage to the furniture, walls, flooring, and plastering. For the purpose of giving the sentinels and guards a better command of the military prison, the partitions and outer walls were cut through and greatly damaged. The repairs made necessary by the aforesaid occupation required a large expenditure of money.

For this occupancy, and for the injury done to the college, the memorialists think they ought to have $10,000 or $12,000 per annum for rent, and $12,000 for repairs, making in all from $52,000 to $60,000. Of the amount of repairs, as itemized in the testimony of Henry Noeth, the committee do not think more than $7,000 is properly chargeable to the occupancy by the Union forces, and that, judged by its effects upon the school, such occupancy cost the college all of $12,000 per annum, yet the committee have thought it best to reduce that claim.

The occupancy of the college in question is testified to by the officers then in command, and among them Col. Henry F. Harrington, now the president of the board of public schools of the city of Saint Louis.

The amount of damages, &c., is shown by various witnesses and from the books of the college, where the expense of repairs was kept. Institutions of religion, learning, and charity are respected by all civilized nations, and by the well-established law of nations are exempted from the usual operations of war. The Society of Christian Brothers has peculiar claims upon the Government and mankind at large. They are not a religious or priestly order; they do not, and under the laws of the society can not, own any property as individuals. In this respect they very much resemble the primitive Christians. They live and labor for all mankind—their charity is extended to all.

Had this building been a machine-shop or a factory, occupied as the college was, its owner would be entitled to a fair and just compensation. We can not do otherwise with this institution.

The committee allow the sum of $20,000 for the use and occupation of the college, and recommend the passage of the said House bill No. 6881, with the following amendment: Strike out the words "thirty-five," in line 6 of the bill, and insert "twenty."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will announce that the hour has expired.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. PETERS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (S. 104) providing for the printing and distribution of the Descriptive Catalogue of Government Publications.

H. H. ALEXANDER.

Mr. MCADOO. I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution for reference.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That H. H. Alexander be paid the sum of $162 for services as stenographer to the subcommittee of the Committee on Accounts from January 21, 1884, to January 31, 1884, inclusive.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Accounts.

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution for reference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That all documents and books ordered to be published by the present Congress, and which are actually printed prior to the first Monday of December next, together with documents and books heretofore ordered to be printed which have not been actually printed, to which members of the present Congress are or would have been entitled if published prior to the 4th of March next, and which are actually printed prior to the first Monday of next December, shall be allotted, as heretofore, to members of the present Congress, and transmitted to their residences as fast as printed, unless otherwise ordered by the members themselves.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing.

GIRARD AND MOBILE RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. PAYSON, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported, as a substitute for H. R. 179, a bill (H. R. 8180) to declare forfeited a grant of land in aid of the Girard and Mobile Railroad, in Alabama; which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the House Calendar, and ordered to be printed; and the bill (H. R. 179) was ordered to be laid on the table.

MARTHA C. BREESE.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back the bill (H. R. 4280) to increase the pension of Martha C. Breese; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. THOMAS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back with an adverse recommendation the joint resolution (H. Res. 311) tendering the thanks of Congress to Commander Winfield Scott Schley, Commander G. W. Coffin, and Lieut. William H. Emory, jr., of the United States Navy, and to the officers and men under their command, for the rescue of Lieut. A. W. Greely and his surviving comrades, of the Lady Franklin Bay expedition; which was ordered to be laid on the table, and the accompanying report printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I demand the regular order.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I suppose now would be as good a time as any to inquire of the gentleman from Kentucky as to the bill under consideration in the Committee of the Whole. I am instructed by the unanimous voice of the Committee on Appropriations to make an inquiry as to when the gentleman in charge of the bill expects to reach a final vote on its passage?

Mr. WILLIS. I can only reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania by stating, what he knows and what every other member of the House knows, that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors have prosecuted the consideration of the bill as fast as these abominable rules will permit us to do, and we propose to continue that effort and reach a determination of all the issues involved at the earliest possible moment. We are ready to go on now. We are ready to proceed to-morrow, and will go on to-night if the House will permit us to do so. We are as anxious to dispose of this bill as the gentleman can possibly be for us to get it out of the way; and it is with this view that I have submitted the motions which I have made to expedite its passage.

I will state a fact that is well known, that the committee in the Senate which has charge of the river and harbor appropriation bill, has no business before it and is awaiting the passage of this bill, while the Committee on Appropriations, which will have charge of all of the appropriation bills, has already a half a dozen bills before them and are busy with their consideration, while the committee to which I have referred have nothing to do. And for that purpose my aim and the aim of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, with the help of the members on the floor, is to get it out of the way as quickly as possible that the committee of the Senate may consider and act upon it.

Mr. RANDALL. This bill, if its consideration is continued to-day and to-morrow, will have occupied the entire week. The Committee on Appropriations consider that this House will not be free from public criticism if the appropriation bills are not all sent to the Senate by the 22d to the 25th of this month. To accomplish that the committee are of opinion that they should have the right of way after Saturday night, and that on Monday a serious effort should be made on their part—and in this effort they are united as one man—to claim next week for the Post-Office appropriation bill and the legislative appropriation bill, and for the sundry civil bill, which is likely to be reported early enough to take up any of the days unoccupied toward the end of next week. And I have thought and the committee thought it was due to the gentlemen who advocate and have special charge of the pending bill that this intimation should be given.

Mr. HISCOCK. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow a suggestion from this side of the House? The Commerce Committee of the Senate will have but one appropriation bill to consider. I mean this bill. I suppose in the Senate it goes to the Committee on Commerce. The Appropriations Committee of the Senate has to consider all the appropriation bills. Now it seems to me, if we are not to have an extra session of Congress, the general appropriation bills should now have the right of way, and should go over as soon as possible to be referred to the Appropriations Committee of the Senate.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order. Rule XXVI provides as follows:

Friday in every week shall be set apart for the consideration of private business unless otherwise determined by a two-thirds vote of the members present and voting.

Now, we have on the Calendar twenty-four pages of private bills, aggregating about——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Is this in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky rose to make a point of order. He will state it.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The point of order is that the regular order to-day is the consideration of private bills.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not see that the gentleman presents any point of order.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the call of committees for reports of private bills. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] moves to dispense with the consideration of private bills for to-day. The question is upon that motion.

The motion was agreed to (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

Mr. WILLIS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair. Will the order just made, dispensing with the consideration of private business, take away the night session for the consideration of pension bills?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not think that the order has that effect.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I supposed not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not understand that the motion embraced dispensing with the regular Friday night session on pension bills. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] moves that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. WILLIS. Pending that I move that the order for a recess at 5 o'clock shall be extended so that the recess shall commence at 6 o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion requires unanimous consent.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the order for a recess this evening at 5 o'clock shall be extended so that the recess shall commence at 6 o'clock.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. HAMMOND in the chair), and resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 8130) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. Before the pending question is stated, the Chair will submit the request of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS] that he be permitted to extend his remarks, as they will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection, and the request is granted.

The pending question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS].

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Improving harbor at Norwalk, Conn.: Continuing improvement, $3,000.

Mr. WAIT. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improvement of the river and harbor at Niantic, in Connecticut, $5,000.

Mr. WAIT. This river and harbor have been twice examined by the surveyors and engineers of the United States, and twice they have reported in favor of an appropriation for the improvement of that river and harbor. The report of the Engineer did not reach the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in sufficient time to have an appropriation voted for by the committee and put in their bill. I therefore offer this amendment, after having conferred with the chairman of the committee.

The engineer who made the last examination, and that was within the past year, recommended an appropriation of $8,000 for the improvement of this river and harbor. They are virtually one thing. The harbor is an indentation into the coast and the river is an extension really of the harbor, but about a mile or a mile and a half inland from the south.

The object of this improvement is to permit the raw material and the coal required for the mills to be brought there, which they can not now bring there except at very high tides. It is impossible at any other time on account of the bar in the harbor; nor can they go up the river with it on account of the bar at the mouth of the river. There is a constant desire on the part of the owners to bring coal and to bring material to use in these mills by water, and to stop the expensive transportation by land from New London, which is five or six miles distant from the mills.

In addition to that the State of Connecticut has purchased thirty-eight acres of land there and established a State camp, and for a week or ten days each year there is a constant necessity for the running there of steamers of all kinds, not only for the transportation of troops from other parts of the State to this camp, but for bringing the materials necessary for the use of the camp.

A very large and bright and beautiful village is built up there. The Baptists have their annual gatherings there, and it is the same with the Spiritualists. Material has to be brought for the erection of houses and churches, but there exists this embarrassment resulting from the bar in the river. I offer this amendment, and I hardly think that the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, after the conversation I have had with him and with other members of the committee, will object to it. I believe that public convenience and public necessity require this improvement to be made; that the demands of commerce require it; that the necessities of the State require it. The petition that has been sent to me, and which I have shown to the gentlemen, is headed by ex-Governor Waller and by every leading military man in the State; and it asks that this improvement be made as a matter of public convenience and public necessity. I do not wish to occupy more time upon the subject. I have stated the case, and every gentleman who is familiar with the facts knows that I have stated them correctly. I ask only for an appropriation of $5,000, and the engineer has recommended an appropriation for this work of $8,000.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Connecticut state the page of the report on which this item appears?

Mr. WAIT. It is not in the report. It was not received in time to go into the printed report.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Has there ever been an appropriation for this harbor heretofore?

Mr. WAIT. No. There have been two surveys, and each time a recommendation of an appropriation. The first time it was not brought to the attention of the committee so as to enable them to pass upon it, and on the second occasion the engineer did not send in the report in time to go into the printed volume. If it had come in time it would have appeared in the printed volume.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I call for the reading of the report.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CRISP). The Chair is not aware that there is any such report here. If the gentleman from Kentucky wants to read anything in his own time he can do so; or if he desires to have the Clerk read it, he can send it up.

Mr. WAIT. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the reading of the report. I have it here.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. WAIT] has the report, and I desire to have it read in my time.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

ENGINEER OFFICE, UNITED STATES ARMY,
New Haven, Conn., October 28, 1884.

GENERAL: I have the honor to submit the following report upon the preliminary examination of the river and harbor at Niantic, Conn., made under act of Congress approved July 5, 1884:

Niantic Harbor is an indentation of the Connecticut shore-line, about five miles west of New London, and eight miles east of the Connecticut River.

What is known as the river is but an extension of the harbor inland for three or four miles, the two being separated by the bridge of the shore-line division of the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad.

Upon inquiring of Hon. J. C. WAIT, M. C., in whose Congressional district Niantic Harbor is situated, as to the object of the survey ordered, I was referred by him for the necessary information to Mr. C. P. Sturtevant, of East Lyme, the town in which Niantic is situated, and to Mr. Beckwith, the postmaster at Niantic.

Through these gentlemen I learned that the commerce of the river and harbor is restricted wholly to the importation of coal and to the occasional exportation of railroad-ties and wood, and that formerly a quarry on the river, employing from twenty-five to one hundred men, was operated, but that the difficulty of navigating the harbor and river was so great that it prevented the establishment of other industries on their shores and compelled the hauling from New London of large amounts of freight required by the neighboring community which otherwise would be delivered more cheaply by water.

There are two coal-yards now in use here—one at the bridge, the other at the head of the river about three miles above the bridge. The amount of coal which they handle is between 2,500 and 3,000 tons annually. The number of vessels that enter this harbor is less than one a month. There is no custom-house officer stationed here. The chief difficulty experienced in the outer harbor is within a quarter of a mile of the bridge. The channel here has a depth of only four or five feet at low water, while the mean rise of the tide is about two and a half feet; vessels carrying freight can enter only at high tide, and when this occurs, either before daylight in the morning or after it in the evening, the harbor is practically closed against them, and they are compelled to remain outside subject to the danger of being caught by bad weather in a shallow and exposed harbor.

There is better water up the river, but the channel there is very crooked in places, and navigation is troublesome, as vessels are in constant danger of getting aground.

These obstacles make it difficult and expensive to secure charters for the cargoes of coal that have to be brought here.

From the statements made to me it appears that the present channel below the bridge has altered very little, if any, since it assumed its present course after the building of the railroad bridge, and it is probable therefore that if it were improved the improvement would be of a permanent character.

To deepen this channel to nine feet at low water for a width of one hundred feet would require the removal of about 20,000 cubic yards of material, which at 20 cents per cubic yard would cost $4,000.

The improvement of the river above the bridge does not appear to be of so much importance at present, as but one mill would be affected by it and the cost of making an unobjectionable channel would be out of proportion to the benefit which it would confer. But its navigation might be very much improved by cutting off some projecting points and widening and deepening it in several places. The removal of 20,000 cubic yards of material would make this a serviceable channel, costing, at 20 cents per cubic yard, $4,000.

Total estimated cost of both improvements, 40,000 cubic yards of dredging, at 20 cents per cubic yard, $8,000.

The present demands of the commerce of the place I have already indicated, and these demands will increase with the growth of the town.

The State of Connecticut has recently established its permanent military camp on the west bank of the Niantic River, just north of the railroad bridge, and has expended a good deal of money in the erection of permanent buildings there; and I am informed that the village is growing rapidly.

In view of the fact herein presented, the little cost of making the contemplated improvement, and the desirability of giving to the community a means of supply which will act as a check upon extravagant railroad charges, it is my opinion that this harbor is worthy of improvement.

The survey, made under the direction of General Warren in 1872, is so much in detail that no further examination or survey is needed here.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WALTER McFARLAND,
Lieutenant-Colonel of Engineers.

Brig. Gen. JOHN NEWTON,
Chief of Engineers.

During the reading of the report the following proceedings took place:

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CRISP). The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. WAIT].

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. WAIT] by striking out the last word, and I ask that the Clerk shall continue the reading of the report. It is very interesting. There is a great deal of commerce on this stream.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I raise the question whether the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] is entitled to hold the floor in this way. The rule that we have becomes a complete farce if a gentleman can continue to occupy the time of the House by merely moving to strike out the last word, or some other word, of every amendment.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I object to this coming out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CRISP). The Chair understands that under the rule the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] is in order in his motion to strike out the last word. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the report.

The Clerk then continued and completed the reading of the report as above quoted.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, in the four minutes remaining I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that notwithstanding this is a very small harbor, it is of quite as much importance to the people living in its neighborhood as greater harbors are to the people of larger communities. I am not one of those that believe in appropriating money merely for the Mississippi and the other "great water ways" (according to the Democratic platform), but I am in favor of appropriating money for the improvement of every navigable river and every navigable harbor within the United States.

Now, sir, it is true that this is a very small harbor. It is comparatively insignificant; but the engineer reports that there is some commerce there, and the engineer reports furthermore that if this harbor is improved it will tend to cheapen transportation, which the railroads now monopolize. In that sentence is the gist of all our appropriations for rivers and harbors. It is to have commerce flow unrestricted, it is to have some way of checking the extravagant charges of railroad corporations that we make these appropriations. This is a small harbor, but it is not so small as Hingham; neither is Hingham so large as Plymouth. We have appropriated $6,000 for the small harbor of Hingham, which has some commerce, very little commerce, and we have appropriated a smaller amount for the larger harbor of Plymouth.

Now, sir, the recommendation for an appropriation for this little harbor has come too late for the committee to consider it—I mean the committee with closed doors; but it is in ample time for this committee. It goes alongside of Hingham Harbor, which, upon the representations of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG], has been appropriated for in this bill, not on the recommendation of the committee that sits with closed doors, but by a majority of this honorable Committee of the Whole House. I ask, therefore, that the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. WAIT] be adopted.

Mr. WAIT. Mr. Chairman, is my time entirely exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. WILLIS. I hope we shall have a vote.

Mr. WAIT. The report of the engineer——

Mr. WILLIS. I object to further debate. Every word that has been uttered has been in favor of this proposition. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors were unanimous in rejecting this appropriation. This case was not like that of Hingham Harbor, which was not before the committee. This case was before the committee, and the proposed appropriation was unanimously rejected upon the ground that there was no public necessity for it, that no commercial interests demanded this expenditure. I trust we shall have a vote.

Mr. WAIT. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word, because I feel bound in duty to my constituents to respond to what has just fallen from the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. If the committee examined the facts in this case before rejecting the proposition, they did not examine all the facts. The improvement which this amendment proposes would afford facilities for the carrying of raw material to a very large woolen mill up this river, as well as an oil factory. It would also enable our beautiful granite to be transported to market. We desire such an improvement made as will give steamers access to this river.

There was a time, as the report states, before the river became obstructed, when a large number of persons were employed in quarrying granite for transportation to various points, to be used for building purposes and to be wrought into monuments. It is true, as stated by the engineer, that if this river were made properly accessible it would be of great advantage to the manufacturing interests of that locality, which are now compelled to pay for railroad transportation five or six miles to New London or eight miles to the Connecticut River.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment to strike out the last word.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. WAIT, it was not agreed to—there being, ayes 43, noes 53.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Buffalo, N. Y.: Continuing improvement, $75,000.

Mr. ROGERS, of New York. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 55, strike out "75" and insert "100," so as to make the appropriation for continuing improvement of harbor at Buffalo, N. Y., $100,000.

Mr. ROGERS, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I have the honor to represent in this House the district in which this improvement is being carried on; and I know something of the needs of this work. Here is an improvement of which the estimated cost is over $1,200,000. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors propose to grant an appropriation of $75,000. This improvement has been going on for the last ten years, and on account of the small appropriations little more than half the work is now completed. At this rate it will take ten years more to finish the improvement. I think I am very modest in the amendment I now propose, and hope that the committee will accede to it.

Mr. HISCOCK. I wish that my colleague would have read the report of the engineer on this subject.

Mr. ROGERS, of New York. The Chief of Engineers recommends for this improvement an appropriation of $300,000.

Mr. HISCOCK. I wish my colleague would have the recommendation read.

Mr. ROGERS, of New York. It is found on page 321, and I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Buffalo Harbor, New York.—The original project for the improvement of this harbor was adopted in 1826, the date of the first appropriation, and as modified at various times provided for the construction of a north and south pier at the mouth of Buffalo Creek, a masonry sea-wall running south from the inner end of the south pier and a breakwater less than half a mile in front of the Buffalo light-house, its long arm extending nearly parallel with the shore.

The present project was adopted in 1874, and provides for the construction of a breakwater of crib-work, 7,600 feet long, running parallel to the shore and a shore arm of pile and crib-work, 4,100 feet long, running out toward the southern end of the main or detached breakwater, leaving an opening about 150 feet wide between them.

The total amount appropriated for this harbor up to the close of the fiscal year was $1,661,880.41, of which $1,487,352.41 have been expended, resulting in the construction of the north and south piers, the sea-wall, 4,891 linear feet of detached breakwater, and 870 linear feet of pile pier. The main breakwater is now being extended 800 feet, and will be finished early in the coming fiscal year.

The south pier, the pile pier, and the northern portion of the main breakwater are very much in need of repairs.

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask my colleague to state the commerce of Buffalo.

Mr. ROGERS, of New York. The tonnage of Buffalo last year was about 4,000,000 tons and the custom-house receipts about $850,000. Our shippers there are now very much embarrassed for want of harbor facilities. These facilities will be largely increased when this improvement is completed, not before. I trust the committee will see the propriety of acceding to this amendment.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors found that on July 1, 1883, there was to the credit of the Buffalo Harbor improvement $121,395; from July 1, 1883, to July 1, 1884, there was expended only $37,382; so that on the 1st day of July, 1884, there was available for this improvement more than $84,000. Now, by the last river and harbor bill, approved July 5, 1884, we appropriated for this improvement $100,000. Thus there is available for the fiscal year ending July 30, 1885—the present year—$184,000. Now, we propose in this bill an appropriation of $75,000, making more than $250,000 available for the improvement of Buffalo Harbor for the remainder of the present fiscal year and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886.

Now, as only $37,000 was spent on this work during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884——

Mr. ROGERS, of New York. I will explain why more was not expended.

Mr. BLANCHARD. How is it that my friend expects the engineers to spend upon this work $250,000 from now till the end of the coming fiscal year? That is why the committee did not give any more than $75,000. We thought it was as much as they could expend in one year, judging by the expenditures of the past year.

Mr. STEVENS. Has the gentleman from Louisiana any advice as to how much money has been expended or will be expended on the 30th of June, 1885? He refers to a certain amount applicable on hand during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885. Is he in possession of any information from the War Department that will enable us to tell how much has been expended during the past year?

Mr. BLANCHARD. We have no information other than that furnished to us in these printed reports, but we did see by these printed reports they did not expend but $37,000 in the year preceding the last year, and last year we gave $100,000, leaving $84,000 to the credit of that harbor, while in addition we have given in this bill $75,000, which increases the amount to $230,000.

Mr. STEVENS. For two years.

Mr. BLANCHARD. For the balance of this year and for the next fiscal year.

Mr. ROGERS, of New York. I can explain to the gentleman from Louisiana why only $37,000 was expended during that year. Contracts were invited by the engineers, but when opened they were found to be excessive—so much so they refused to entertain them at all; and consequently they had to make return to Washington, so that the contracts were thrown over to the succeeding year. My friend from Louisiana will understand, under existing contracts the bulk of the appropriation now made will be used during the present year. This is an important work, and Congress would do well to appropriate twice the amount to complete this work. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. BLANCHARD. I desire to say the committee recognize the great importance of Buffalo Harbor, and since they have $244,000 on hand less the amount they have expended during the last six months, and inasmuch as Buffalo gets the same proportion as other harbors all over the country, I submit the amendment of my friend from New York should not be adopted.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move to strike out the last word, and will say a single word in reference to this matter. The harbor of Buffalo receives the commerce of the lakes. It is an important harbor—important not only to New York and to the farther East, but to the shippers of the West. What are the facts about it? Proposals were submitted to the War Department to do the work for which appropriation was made, but the bids received were excessive and were rejected. New advertisements were necessary, and the result was the work was delayed. The money on hand is covered by contracts substantially in existence. Therefore there are no such funds in the Treasury as the gentleman from Louisiana has indicated. What money is there is pledged to the execution of existing contracts.

It does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, the amount asked by my colleague is little enough, and I hope it will be granted.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 66, noes 41.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIS. I reserve the right to ask a vote on this amendment in the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Buttermilk Channel, New York: Continuing improvement, $10,000.

Mr. BELFORD. I move to strike out "$10,000" and insert "one million." [Great laughter.] I hope I will have the attention of my distinguished, genial, and lovable friend from the State of New York [Mr. COX], the gentleman whose countenance is invariably lighted by the sunbeams of the Arctic frozen ocean, the sunbeams of the Orient, the sunbeams of the West, and the sunbeams of the East; whose heart is as mellow as that of a child, and whose voice is as sweet as that of a lute. [Laughter.]

Several MEMBERS. Give us his name!

A MEMBER. There is no such man in this House. That man must be a woman. [Laughter.]

Mr. BELFORD. He comes in here with a proposition to improve the channel of buttermilk, and asks the House to appropriate the sum of $10,000 for that magnificent project! [Laughter.]

Buttermilk! We have constructed great railroads across the plains where we have expended millions of dollars in their achievement and accomplishment. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] Oh, hold on! [Laughter.] And now, when we are coming to open up in the very heart of this continent a channel to furnish us all with a glass of buttermilk, our distinguished friend from New York has limited it to $10,000. My proposition is to vote $1,000,000 for this amendment. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] Oh! well, you will vote when I get ready for you to vote. [Laughter.]

One million of dollars, I think, should be appropriated, which will give full value for the money invested in this country. That will provide every voter in the country one glass of buttermilk, at least. [Laughter.] Now, if we consume buttermilk on election day, you can readily appreciate the fact that we will have a decent and orderly election. We all commenced in early life with a fondness for milk. [Laughter.] [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] Oh! you will vote when I get through with this floor. I say we began with a fondness for milk, but that was sweet milk. [Laughter.] Then when we got to college our sweet, gentle, and kindly mothers brought us a glass of buttermilk to cure our sores and overcome our pains; and here is the great representative council of this nation, in view of a subject of such pre-eminent and magnificent importance, proposing to vote the little trifling sum of $10,000 to construct a channel in this country through which we can pour buttermilk! [Renewed laughter.]

But I want to look at some other things in this bill a little while. I am opposed to a good many of them, but I propose to support the bill. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] Don't be in a hurry. [Laughter.] I propose to vote on the principle on which the young robin takes its food—shut my eyes, open my mouth, and swallow whatever is put into this bill—bugs, lizards, whatever it may be. [Laughter.] I will take it all in a lump. Now I alluded to this buttermilk question because I wanted my distinguished and eloquent friend from New York [Mr. COX] to make a speech. I have heard him make magnificent speeches on the river and harbor bill; but he has been silent up to this present time on the pending bill. I want him to make such a grand speech as he made on the census bill, as a eulogy on buttermilk. Commence, my friend, from your earliest recollections, if you can go back that far—sweet milk—and then make the buttermilk sweet by the genial smile of your face and the eloquence of your tongue. [Laughter.]

I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. COX, of New York. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of saying a word in response to my genial friend from Colorado. I do not propose to discuss any kind of drink, nor do I propose to say anything about rivers and harbors except that I had no relation whatever to this matter of the appropriation of $10,000 for the improvement of Buttermilk Channel.

This channel is in the upper part of the bay of New York, between Governor's Island and the mainland, and provision is made for it in this bill in pursuance of proper estimates and recommendations by the board of engineers. It does not, however, touch the main matter that will be presented hereafter as to the improvement of the harbor of New York. It is only one of those indispensable things which necessarily go into the preparation of a bill of this character, and which demand attention as forming parts of the general scope of the improvement of the whole harbor of New York.

I will say simply, to give my gentle friend from Colorado a little bit of facetiæ, so that he can have an opportunity of pondering and sleeping on it to-night, that this was called "Buttermilk" Channel because in the early days, owing to the shoaling at times, the waters of the channel were churned up so as to resemble very much in appearance buttermilk; but latterly, owing to changes in the tide and improvements in the channel, the shoaling has ceased to a great extent, and we have now almost twelve feet of navigable water in this channel. Time has obscured the original meaning of the term as applied to this channel, which term has no meaning now except that my friend from Colorado has given it the glorious glow of his Western eloquence.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

Mr. COX, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I wish to ask the gentleman if he knows how much the officer in charge of the work at that point gets as an annual salary and how much the plant is worth with which the operations are carried on.

Mr. COX, of New York. I have no relation whatever to this appropriation, but no doubt the Committee on Rivers and Harbors will answer the question of the gentleman satisfactorily.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I move to strike out the last word——

Mr. WILLIS. I only desire to say in regard to Buttermilk Channel——

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Who has the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Kentucky who now addresses the Chair.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. With a view of presenting this matter before the committee in proper shape I shall move now to strike out $10,000 and make the appropriation for this point $20,000, as recommended by the engineers.

I make the motion for this reason, that if the gentlemen of this committee—not the committee with closed doors, but this Committee of the Whole—will go through this bill carefully and study the estimates of the Chief of Engineers they will see that by the appropriation of a little more money they can close up scores of these works. If the engineer reports can be relied upon this important work, which began with nine and a half feet, I believe, and now has twenty-six feet of water, a harbor that admits all sizes of vessels and is of importance to commerce, not only to New York but to this whole country, can be completed for $20,000, which the Chief of Engineers says will be sufficient for the work. Why, then, give $10,000? Why continue the expense through the next year and the next year, with an additional expense of the officers in charge, with the plant and equipage and machinery, everything necessary to continue the work, instead of completing it now by this small additional appropriation?

What I am saying in regard to the Buttermilk Channel will apply to nearly all the small appropriations in this bill.

Now I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact [cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]—I hope this will not be taken out of my time. I do not desire to speak to those members who are yelling "Vote!" "Vote!" I am talking, as I think, to the question under consideration in the light of the information given us by the Engineer Department and the facts that are pertinent to this case. And if gentlemen have no more respect for me than to halloo "Vote!" when I address the committee, they should have regard for their own oaths under the Constitution and for the rules of the House under which I speak.

I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that in the bill which was vetoed by the President there were only eleven small harbors at $5,000, only one at $4,500, only one at $4,000, only six at $3,000, only three at $2,000. But the bill passed by your party last year and signed by the President had fifteen at $5,000, one at $4,000, two at $3,000, four at $2,000, and one at $1,000, making a difference in favor of the bill of the Forty-seventh Congress and in favor of the Republicans that passed that bill.

I desire to call your attention to the fact that in that bill we attempted to complete some works; we attempted to appropriate enough money, not only for the officers in charge, not only for the maintenance of the plant, but to finish the work. And if you are afraid to complete anything, if you simply want to keep the works going, with the machinery and the officers that are there, until your party comes into power, your party which has been benefited by the civil-service law, I ask you how this applies to your civil-servise law? The chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors was the very gentleman whose praises were sounded in connection with the civil-service bill. Yet he and his committee, sitting with closed doors, propose to keep these little works going on. I say it is more like statesmanship to appropriate $20,000 and close it than to appropriate $10,000 for the officers there to keep the machinery barely in motion and not complete the work.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE].

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

That if any person shall knowingly and willfully, by any process or in any manner, deposit or cause to be deposited, or authorize, instigate, or aid in depositing, any refuse, dirt, materials, ashes, cinders, or any substance other than that flowing from street sewers and carried therefrom in a liquid state, into tidal waters within the navigable waters of the harbor of New York, or its adjacent and tributary waters, whereby a deposit shall or may be created and the depth of water lessened, such person, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by imprisonment of not more than one year, or by fine not more than $2,500, or by both such fine and imprisonment; and that the sum of $5,000 be, and is hereby, appropriated to carry out the provisions of this section; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to pay that sum from any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. The court having jurisdiction of all violations of this act shall be the United States court of the southern district of the State of New York.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I reserve all points of order on the paragraph.

Mr. PERKINS. I desire to call the attention of the committee to the language found in line 104, and also in line 84, where "this section" is spoken of. That was undoubtedly the language of the original bill, but when incorporated in this bill the phraseology should be changed and should read in each case "provisions of this act."

Mr. BLANCHARD. We have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment suggested by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS], so far as it relates to line 84, can now only be made by unanimous consent of the committee, the paragraph in which that line occurs having been passed from and the next paragraph read. Without objection the word "section," in line 84, will be changed to "act."

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the amendment to substitute the word "act" for the word "section" in line 104.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COX, of New York. I desire to suggest another verbal amendment at line 108, to insert the word "district" before "court." As the language is now it is very indefinite.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remark to the gentleman from New York that that amendment is in order. The other was not, because the committee had passed from the paragraph.

Mr. THOMAS. That is all right.

The Clerk read the amendment proposed by Mr. COX, of New York, as follows:

In line 108, after the word "States," insert the word "district;" so that it will read, "United States district court."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next paragraph, lines 110 and 111, as follows:

Improving harbor at Canarsie Bay, New York: Continuing improvement, $5,000.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I make the point of order on the paragraph ending with line 109 that it is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that the point of order is made too late. The Clerk has read the next paragraph.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. When the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS] took the floor I rose and stated I reserved points of order.

Mr. COX, of New York. Two amendments to the paragraph have been voted on since and adopted by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] stated he would reserve points of order. Two amendments were then voted on, and the next paragraph was read without any objection being made.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I beg pardon of the Chair. I was doing my best to make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point is too late.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I must appeal from the decision of the Chair. I appeal to the record to show whether when the gentleman from Kansas offered his correction I did not then give notice that I would raise the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky does not seem to understand the Chair. He did give notice, but he made no point of order until after amendments were voted on and the next paragraph was read.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. That was not my fault. I desired recognition but could not get it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky did not ask for recognition.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I do not know what is required to make a demand for recognition if it did not constitute such a demand that I rose in my place and stated that I reserved points of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question is: Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Improving harbor at Charlotte, N. Y.: Continuing improvement, $30,000.

Mr. STEVENS. I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 6, at the end of the line 113, insert as follows:
"Improving Oak Orchard Harbor, New York: Continuing the improvement, $10,000."

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, I regret exceedingly the necessity that has compelled me to occupy the time of the committee in offering this amendment; but, in common with the other members of this House who are not members of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, I have had no opportunity to present the claims of this harbor before that committee. I only desire to say now that it has already had expended upon it $173,500, and that the engineers of the War Department report that the amount required to complete the improvements is $92,000. They recommended last year $40,000, and they again reported that amount as one which could be properly and economically expended there this year. The harbor is not only necessary for the wants of commerce, but it is quite an important harbor. The revenue collected there during the last year for United States customs was $1,951. The engineer reports that this harbor is important to the wants of the commerce on Lake Ontario as a harbor of refuge, and it appears that during the year preceding his last report fifty vessels in stress of weather sought it as a harbor of refuge.

It is an important harbor. It has had appropriations heretofore, but during the last Congress it had only $50,000. It is stated to be actually a harbor of necessity, and it is certainly one of great importance to the commerce of Lake Ontario. I have offered this amendment in good faith, believing that the people of that section with the interests of commerce require the appropriation, and I do trust that, notwithstanding the Committee on Rivers and Harbors have refused to make any appropriation for this purpose, the good sense of this Committee of the Whole House will see the propriety of adopting this amendment.

The question was taken on the amendment; and there were—ayes 86, noes 28.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, without waiting now to ask a vote by tellers I will reserve a vote upon this amendment in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Dunkirk, N. Y.: The sum heretofore appropriated is to be used one-half for the repair of the beacon and the remainder for dredging.

Mr. BREWER, of New York. I offer an amendment as a substitute which I ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For improving the harbor at Dunkirk, N. Y.: Five thousand dollars in addition to the $10,000 heretofore appropriated; $5,000 for repairing the beacon and the remainder for dredging out the channel.

Mr. BREWER, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask for this additional $5,000 for the harbor of Dunkirk for the reasons which I shall explain. I probably might have obtained the insertion of this appropriation in the bill if I could have had an opportunity to explain the matter to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. Two years ago the ice carried out the large day beacon which indicated the entrance to the channel, and it has not been restored. The channel there is cut out of solid rock, and as a result of the disappearance of the beacon the débris from the harbor and from the city has been permitted to fill up, so that it will require somewhat more than the amount appropriated in the bill to clear it out. For that reason I ask the substitution of this amendment instead of the provision in the bill.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say at this point that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors is placed under considerable embarrassment by the fact that if we take time to present and discuss the reasons upon which we have acted in individual cases, we thus place ourselves in the power of those gentlemen who are endeavoring to kill this bill by a waste of the public time; while, on the other hand, if we make no reply to the statements and arguments presented on the other side, of course they stand as good.

Now, with reference to this harbor, the committee did consider the question. It considered it last year at length, and also this year. It considered it three distinct times, and in considering it the committee had in possession all the facts which the gentleman from New York [Mr. BREWER] has presented. But there are certain other facts which the gentleman does not present here, but which are presented by the engineers. I have before me the report of the engineer, in which it is stated that—

Unfortunately for the improvement of this harbor, it can not be made to accommodate the larger vessels except at an enormous expense, since any depth more than twelve and five-tenths feet throughout the entire inclosed area of the harbor must be gained by excavating its solid rock bed. Indeed, I may add that persons who were most sanguine for the lake commerce of Dunkirk a few years ago are now compelled to very much modify, if not to abandon, their expectations.

He goes on to say that there were only twenty vessels that entered that harbor during the past year. So that the harbor is of no considerable commercial importance, while the only improvement that would benefit it, the engineer states, would cost the Government more than the commercial interests of the harbor demand.

I refer to this, Mr. Chairman, as only one of many instances where the Committee on Rivers and Harbors felt that they had ample reason for their action, and if they do not occupy the time of this Committee of the Whole in presenting those reasons in every instance, it is because of the fact, which I have already stated, that they are anxious to press this bill through to a conclusion—willing and anxious to hear all legitimate arguments, but very desirous of speedily reaching some conclusion upon the whole bill. I ask for a vote.

Mr. BREWER, of New York. Am I not entitled to some additional time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is entitled to three minutes.

Mr. BREWER, of New York. I do not object to what the gentleman has said about the improvement of the harbor; but he does not state the matter with entire accuracy. I do not ask for any money to do new work; the object sought by this appropriation is to replace a beacon which has been carried away by the storms, and which indicated the entrance of the harbor, and also to dredge out the channel, which is cut out of solid rock, and has filled up.

Mr. THOMAS. Was not the provision as it now appears in the bill put in at the gentleman's instance and request?

Mr. BREWER, of New York. I desired an appropriation of $5,000 more to complete the work.

Mr. THOMAS. It was either the gentleman himself or some Representative from his State who induced the committee to insert this provision as it stands, and upon the representation that the appropriation would be satisfactory.

Mr. BREWER, of New York. It was not I, because the amount proposed in the bill is not enough to carry out the work properly.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. BREWER, of New York, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 40, noes 54.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Flushing Bay, New York: Continuing improvement, $10,000.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move an amendment to come in after the paragraph just read.

Mr. YOUNG. I desired to get the attention of the Chair to offer an amendment to come in after the preceding paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] was seeking the floor. I had promised to recognize the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX, of New York. I will yield to the gentleman with pleasure.

Mr. YOUNG. I will offer my amendment afterward.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Tennessee does not desire to take the floor now. The amendment sent to the desk by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to line 118 the following:

"That the United States harbor board herein provided for shall report a plan and estimate for obtaining a permanent channel, sufficient for the wants of commerce, over the Sandy Hook Bar entrance into New York Harbor."

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Chairman, it will be seen by turning to page 43 of this bill that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has very wisely reported a provision for a board to investigate all rivers and harbors to be improved by Federal money.

As to New York Harbor, allow me to thank this committee for its favorable consent to my measure.

It involves little money. It does one thing which is quite valuable to that harbor. It welds the jurisdiction of New Jersey and New York, in regard to this harbor, into one.

It is a part of our pitiable situation as the great commercial city of the continent that we have a divided jurisdiction. The pilot commissioners of New Jersey and New York, while they have not divided with any acrimony, still have divided as to the proper mode of saving our channels and water ways from spoliation by reason of a selfish greed of the contracting mind. The New York State line runs below Governor's Island. New Jersey embraces the Raritan River and Prince's Bay and the waters south of Staten Island. The Federal Government comprehends all the waters of the Lower Bay and Sandy Hook.

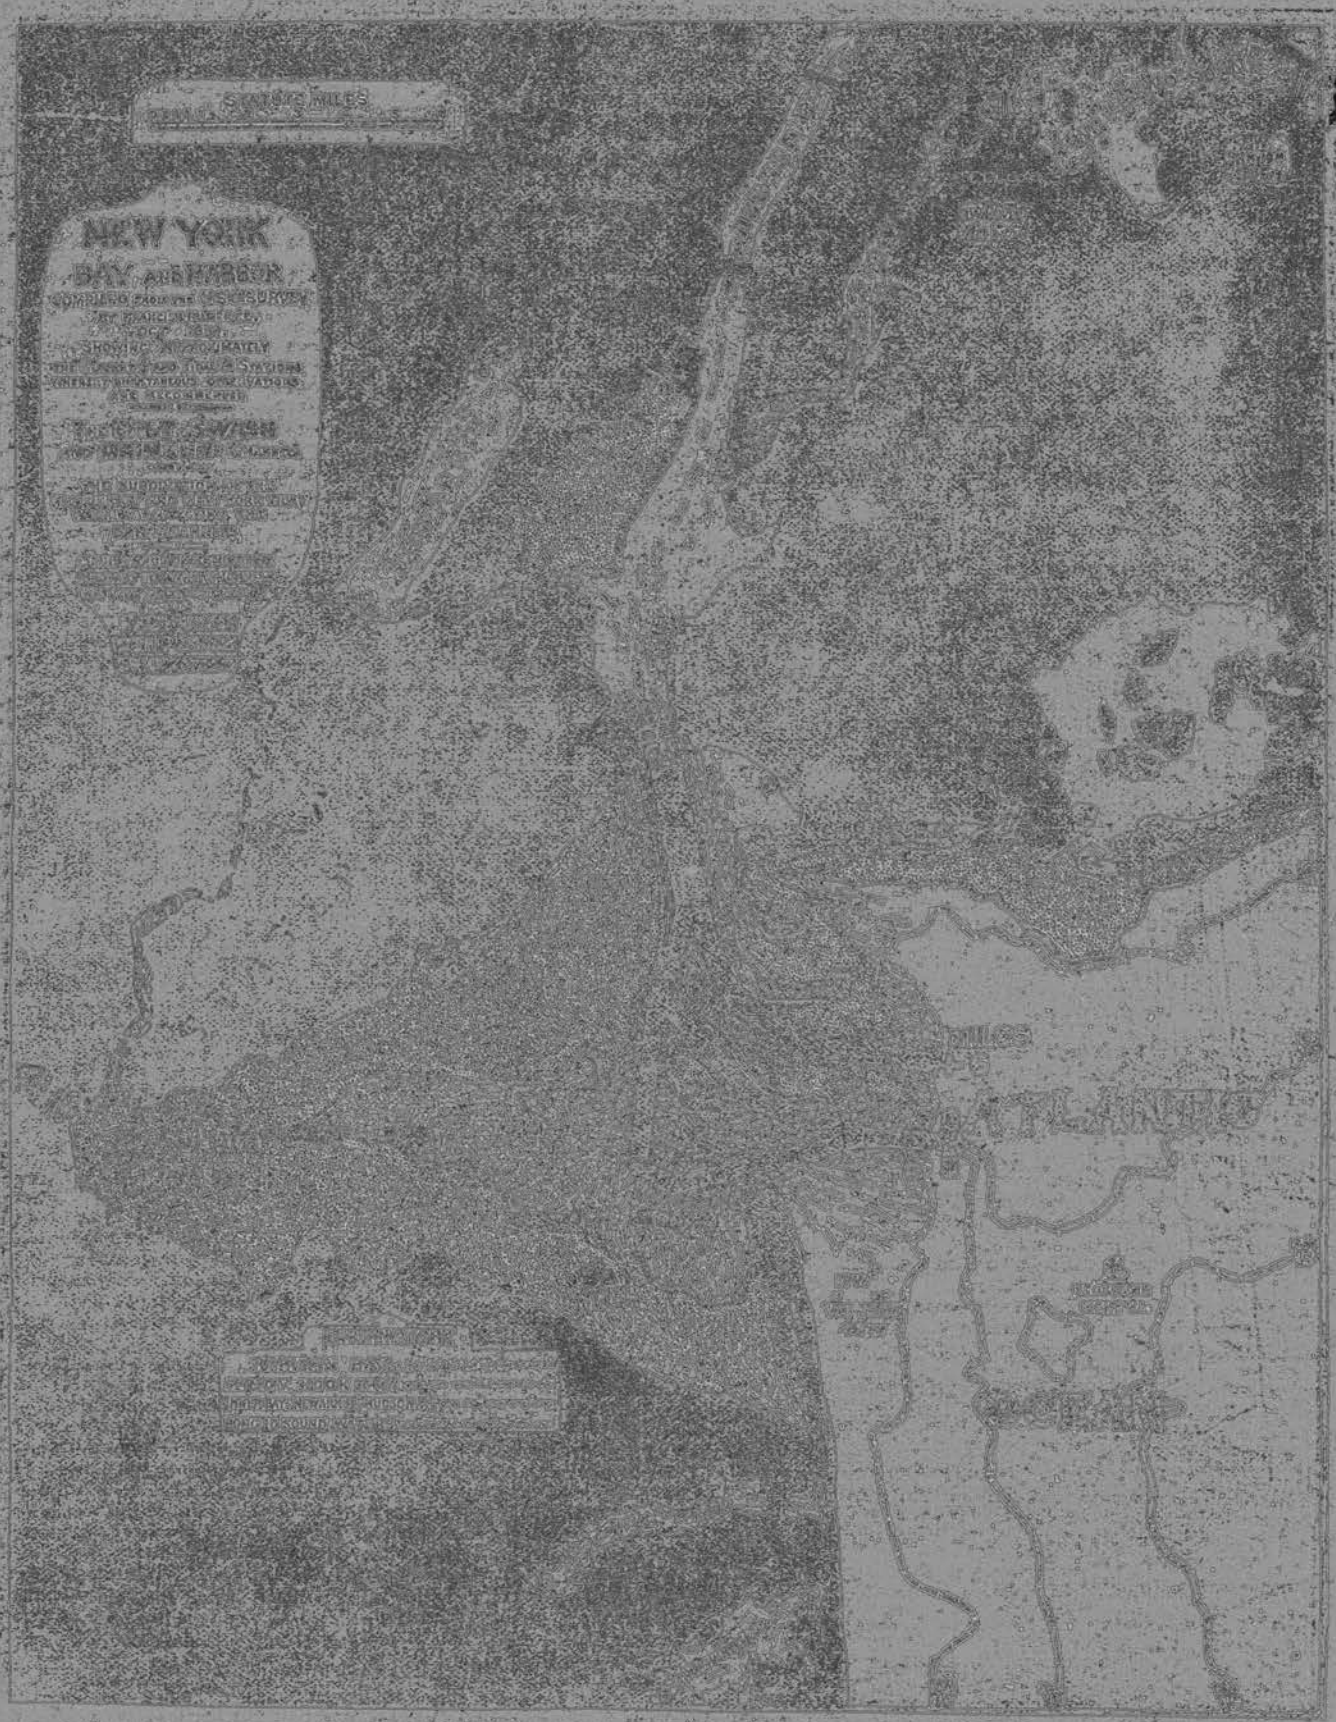
The committee will perceive that there is a great likelihood of a collision, not only between New Jersey and New York, but between the Federal, State, and municipal jurisdictions. The meaning and intent of the sections that have just passed the House is that these varied jurisdictions, which simply hamper and impede, shall be united into one, which shall give a remedy for one of our troubles.

The New Jersey Legislature has demanded this unity of jurisdiction. The Chamber of Commerce of New York and other commercial bodies have done the same. The North Atlantic conference appealed to Congress to give the Federal Government control of this wonderful harbor evoked by nature out of many of her remarkable catastrophes or crises.

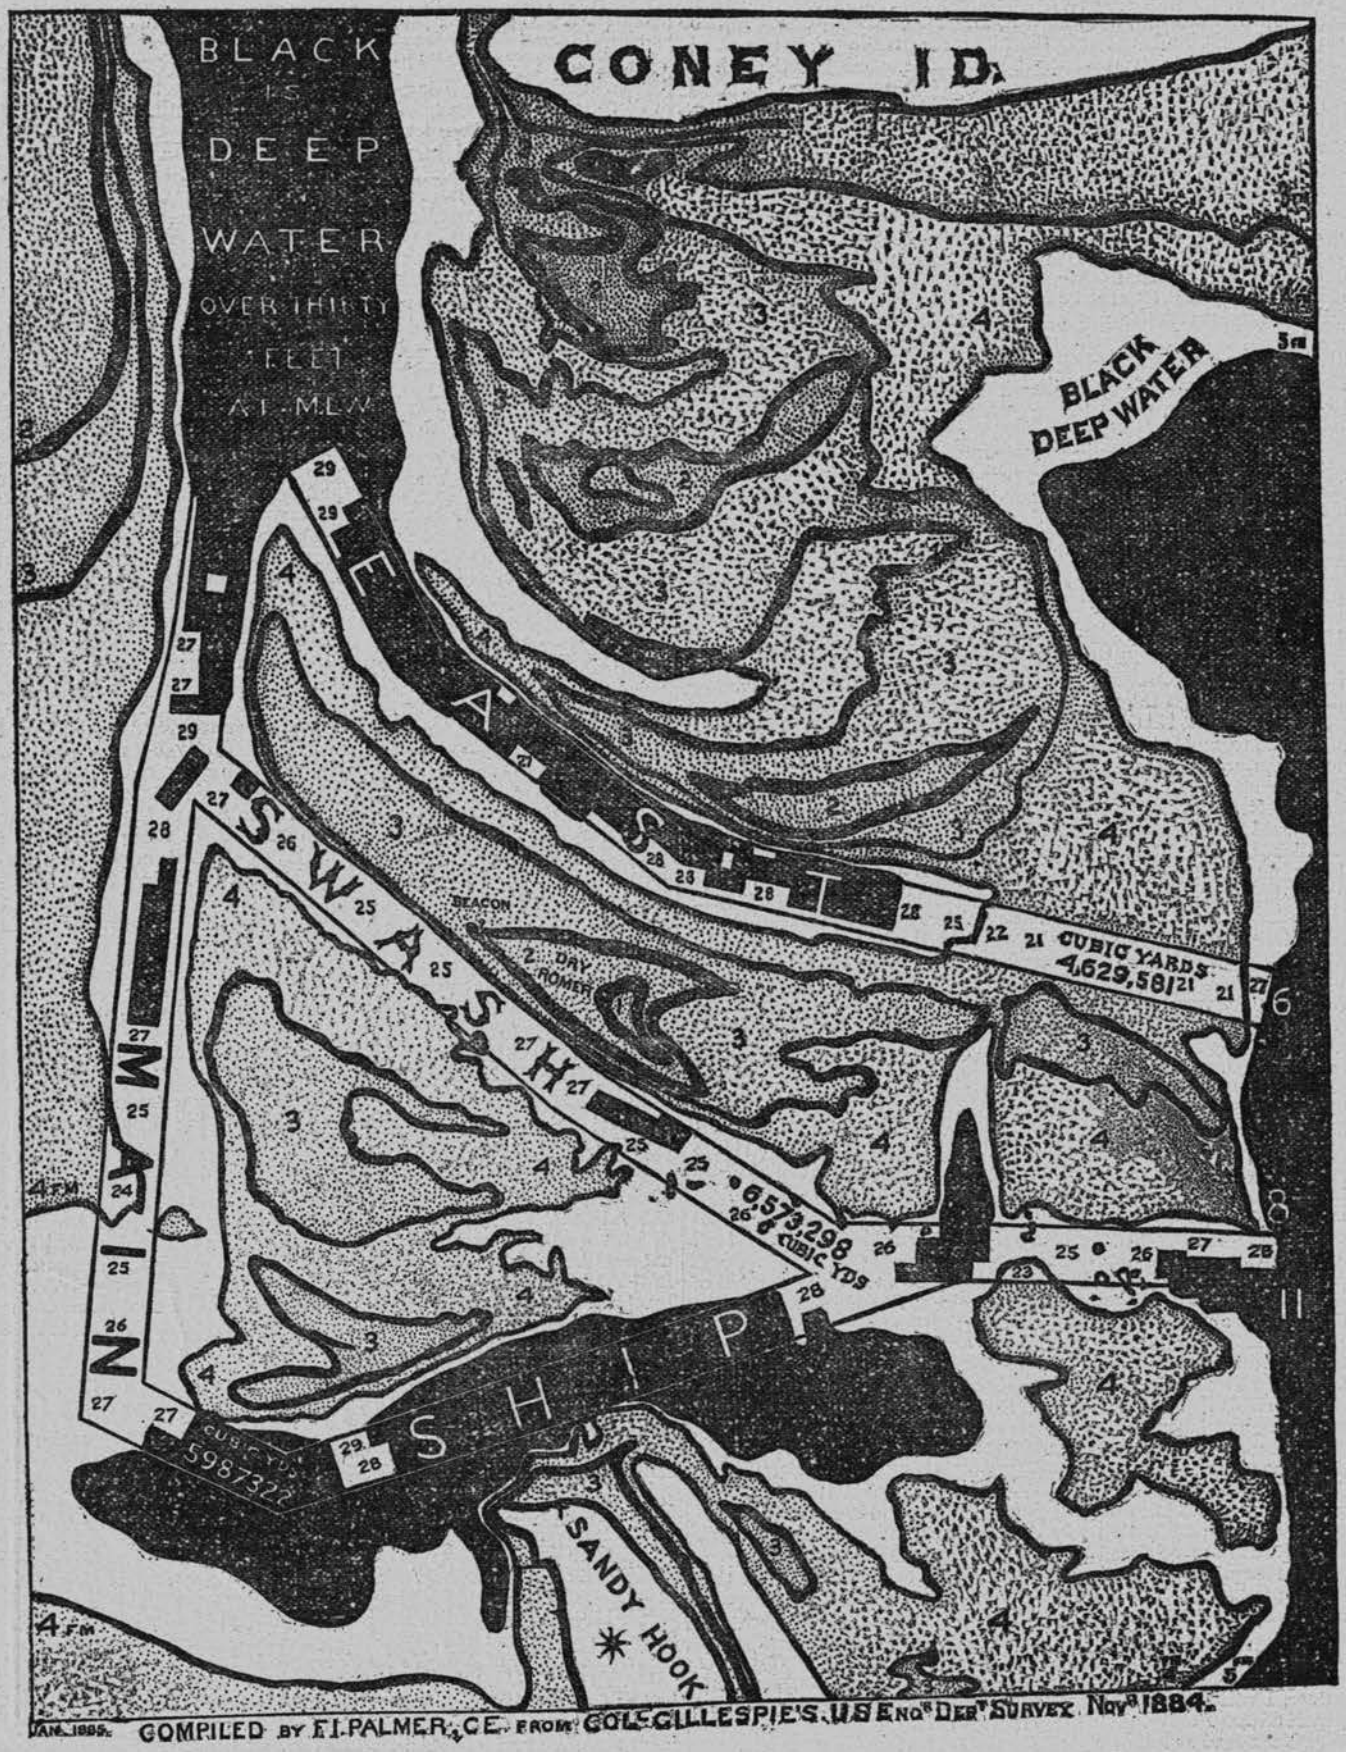
Inasmuch as there are pilot commissioners of New York and New Jersey, and inasmuch as there can be no harmony of action between them, the merchantmen and corporate bodies who have trade at stake come to Congress for relief.

I thank the committee for making the provisions of the bill, which I trust will pass the Senate and become a law; but may I be permitted to say in justification of our vote that the garbage, even in some of the 14-foot channels three miles inside of the prescribed dumping limit, has been so excessive as to call for remonstrance?

The secretary of the New York pilot board, Captain Nash, did not believe that the State of New York could stop the illegal dumping. New Jersey stood in the way. New Jersey had another jurisdiction. Others have said that the commercial world depended upon some action of this kind; the danger to the harbor was imminent; that some united and energetic movement was necessary.



Is it said that some one should care for this garbage and use it for other and wiser purposes? I answer: True. Even Brooklyn and Jersey City utilize this peculiar material. Agriculture, horticulture, and chemistry have their modes of utilizing such garbage. But as long as the contractors and the city government of New York remain as they are there will be no care where the sweepings go, nor what the result is to health or city, provided only the contractors make their large percentage.



The result of this wild license about garbage to our great metropolitan city is that its upper and lower bay are shoaling their waters. There has been a deposit of 1,200,000 pounds of this garbage. If this accretion goes on, the harbor will be closed to the larger steamers. Adopt this amendment, and you give some police system of a Federal nature. Thus this great mischief may be remedied.

Is it said that the State government should do this duty—should stop this dumping? The answer is that all the penalties provided by State laws have failed. Nobody can find out where the dumping takes place or who does it. The dredging-scows return from their work suspiciously very soon. There is nobody to control or watch the harbor.

In further justification of the vote which has been given by the House, may I not say that the gradual filling up of the harbor by the deposit of garbage and with the diminution of the tide area is a matter which concerns the Federal Government? Local jurisdiction has failed to give it the proper care and protection?

The trouble with mere local legislation and law is that it only imposed a pecuniary fine. Such a fine was useless against people like the scow and the steamboat men. We could not convict them. It was impossible to get evidence The appropriation of money from the State was very meager. The State inspector was watched. The dumping was done in places where no one could follow or see it. Men of character, old shipmasters and others, have said that the captains of tugboats were the chief offenders. They could not be reached by a temporary revocation of their licenses. They could not be reached by increasing the penalty for their offenses. There was a lack of legal power. There was a lack of money. The law of the State was evaded.

The truth is, sir, the harbor in the upper and lower bay is Federal, national, international, and continental. No local expedients could or can save it. It needs not only the abstract ægis, but the vigilant police, of the Federal Government. That it will now have, if this bill becomes a law.

It is the general judgment that the Federal Government should take charge of this harbor. It is dedicated to all mankind and not to New York only.

But a larger and better thing remains to be done for New York Harbor. The larger vessels now coming into that harbor frequently touch bottom, because our channel at Sandy Hook is not more than twenty-one or twenty-two feet at low water. It is still shoaling. It is said to be no more than it was a century ago; but recently it has been shoaling. It has shoaled since 1881 two or three feet. We desire for that harbor at least twenty-eight to thirty feet of water. We desire this in order that the largest steamer may come in at mean low tide.

Why, sir, Canada has spent $8,000,000 to deepen the Saint Lawrence River. Canada has spent $40,000,000 for making ship and other canals. These have diverted our trade from the great West away from New York and other ports upon the Atlantic. Is it not time that New York—is it not time that the country which is represented by New York in a commercial way—should heed the necessity of protecting this great harbor?

The only expenditure, Mr. Chairman, ever made in a Federal way for this harbor, outside of Hell Gate, has been only $15,000 for the removal of a wreck. I will not institute comparisons as to what other and less meritorious harbors have received.

New York has at least one-half of all the exports of this country. She has two-thirds of all the imports. She stands as the entrepôt of our inland and outland and coastwise trade. She has besides great railway lines.

The State of New York, sir, has freely given to the West, to the nation, the Erie Canal. She built it with her own resources. She built it for purposes of transportation. She made no ignoble, no unprosperous connection with the lakes and with the great and teeming West.

New York built her Erie Canal within her own borders. Since such questions are mooted here on bills of this kind, it becomes this Congress, representing the whole people, to consider whether New York should be ostracised. There is no part of the country which can afford to say to New York, "We have no need of you." Her splendid harbor should have the care, protection, and advice of the board to be established under this bill. The city itself, the select home of benevolence and charity, should be honored by those who come to her for all sorts of largesses. By aiding to aggrandize her natural greatness gentlemen honor and aid their own communities.

I believe, sir, that if this board be created, it will make a full examination in regard to our harbors, and we may have a good report as to this harbor. We may get rid of this shoaling which now interferes with our commerce. We may lessen the cost of transportation, because by increasing the depth of our channel we may enable the largest vessel to carry one-third more freight. We would thus diminish the expense of transportation.

In this way, sir, we help not merely shippers in New York and Buffalo, but the great West and South, and we will be more or less benefited by the action of such a board.

Mr. Chairman, my colleague [Mr. HEWITT, of New York] has had special charge of matters connected with Sandy Hook and New York Harbor. I am his lieutenant; but I wish to say before we pass from this matter that this Congress should hear him. He stands as the exponent of the whole country, because he so fitly represents New York city and State.

Mr. Chairman, I shall include in my remarks, with the consent of the House, the two diagrams referred to by my honorable colleague. [Pages 1344 and 1345.] They explain the character and extent of this work and the relation to the harbor of New York and its surroundings of the amendment which I propose, and will also illustrate what I have stated here in these hurried five minutes of desultory talk.

Mr. WILLIS. I see no objection to the amendment offered by the gentleman, and I hope the Committee of the Whole will accept.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that the Clerk read the last section not knowing any gentleman desired to amend the section in advance, and in that way the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] was not recognized by the Chair, because the Chair had promised to recognize the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] on this Flushing matter. If the gentleman from Tennessee desires to move an amendment, by unanimous consent he will be recognized for that purpose.

Mr. YOUNG. I know there was no intention on the part of the Chair not to recognize me, and as the gentleman from Louisiana has the floor, I will wait.

Mr. KING. I move, after line 118, to insert.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 118 insert:

"For the improvement of Sandy Hook Channel at the entrance of the harbors of New York, Brooklyn, Jersey City, and Hoboken, and to obtain a depth of thirty-two feet on same, $15,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That none of said sum shall be expended except for surveys of said channels until the proper method of improving same shall have been determined by a commission of seven engineers, familiar with the science of river and tidal currents, to be appointed by the President on or after April 1, 1885, who shall proceed forthwith with the execution of its duties."

Mr. KING. Now, I know there is no possibility under the rules of this body to get that amendment inserted in this bill.

Mr. WILLIS. Then let us go on with the bill.

Mr. KING. But I know equally well there is a necessity for the measure. From the boards of trade of the city of New York, and from what we can gather from the public prints of that city also; from reports made by the great lines of merchantmen passing between that city and Europe, constituting almost daily ferries across the ocean, so clearly stated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] a moment ago, in that great port no ship can enter drawing over twenty-six feet of water. These first-class merchantmen that carry so vast a portion of our commerce are detained on that bar or in front of it, on an average, one-half day in the course of their voyage. That must amount to an expenditure of something between $500 and $1,000 on each occasion.

I do not wish to cast any reproach upon the gentlemen on this floor representing the great city of New York. I only want to call the attention of the country to the fact that notwithstanding what we may do now this necessity of our commerce stares us in the face; and I believe we shall have to meet this expenditure in the near future.

Immediately after the close of the Franco-Prussian war, Mr. Chairman, France, crippled and crushed as she was, appropriated $172,000,000 for her rivers and harbors. And right here I wish to call the attention of the country to the fact that though this river and harbor bill has been much maligned and charged with unnecessary expenditure of public money, there is no measure which can bring to the people greater relief on the part of the Government. There is no country so vast as this that expends so small an amount on rivers and harbors, nor is there one with such vast transportation lines on rivers and lakes for cheap freights. I shall cheerfully co-operate in the future with all who will endeavor to have a provision made to carry out the intent of this amendment. This work may require fifty millions in time, and I feel it would be judicious to spend even that amount to get the relief required.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HISCOCK. I simply take this occasion, Mr. Chairman, to acknowledge the receipt of some articles in the press of the city of New Orleans which I have read, and which I have been receiving for some days, alleging I was to make an assault or do something else in reference to the jetties at the mouth of the Mississippi River. Some reflections have been cast on me in consequence of that allegation. Now, I have never intended to make any such assault—never imagined such an undertaking, and have no sympathy with any such scheme.

Mr. KING. I rise to a question of personal privilege in regard to the remarks of the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his question of privilege.

Mr. KING. The allusion of the gentleman from New York is directed against myself.

Mr. HISCOCK. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. KING. There is no means of covering it up.

Mr. HISCOCK. I say unqualifiedly they were not directed against the gentleman.

Mr. KING. And I say unqualifiedly I understood the gentleman to state in a private conversation with me it was his purpose to state on this floor that the jetties at the mouth of the Mississippi had been of no commercial value to that city. Whereupon, taking him to be in earnest, I immediately telegraphed to the various chambers of commerce in that city as to the benefit to the commerce of the Mississippi Valley by the jetty system at the mouth of the river, and I hold in my hand their answers, and I request that they be printed in the RECORD or read from the desk.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HISCOCK. I hope my colleague will yield to me a little while.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that the gentleman has presented a matter of personal privilege.

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask to be recognized for a moment. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York if his colleague will yield the floor, but his colleague has been recognized.

Mr. HISCOCK. I hope my colleague will yield to me.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I want to occupy at least five minutes.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will take the floor and yield to you if you will allow me to proceed now.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Very well.

Mr. HISCOCK. All I desire to say in reference to it is this: That just so far as I can go and keep myself within the rule of parliamentary language, just to that extent I desire to go in contradicting the statement that I ever advertised that I had any such purpose.

Mr. KING. That you ever advertised it; but the gentleman will not say that in a private conversation he did not make that statement?

Mr. HISCOCK. I have nothing more to say, except that just so far as I can go within the rules of the House I desire to go, and do go, in saying that I have never——

Mr. KING. What?

Mr. HISCOCK. Well, that I have never said that I intended to do any such thing.

Mr. KING. And I state just within the rules of the House that that statement is false.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LOWRY. If the gentleman from New York will yield to me one moment I desire to make a statement.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. If it does not come out of my time I have no objection.

Mr. LOWRY. At the request of the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors I desire to repeat a communication which I have given to him from the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to the effect that he does not expect to be here to-night himself and is willing that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors shall have the time devoted to the consideration of pension matters for the further consideration of this bill.

Several MEMBERS. That is a matter for the House.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. COX, of New York] requires the board created by this act to consider the improvements necessary in the harbor of New York in order that it may respond to the demands upon it as to the foreign and internal commerce of the country. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. KING] supplements that with the proposition to expend a very large amount of money in improving the harbor of that city.

By the bill of last year $200,000 was appropriated for deepening Gedney's Channel. The use of that money has developed a fact probably known for the first time, to the general public certainly, that there has been no shoaling of the deep channel into the port of New York since the memory of man. The fact is apparent that on a comparison of the present depth of water in the main channel with the depth prior to the Revolution, the channel, instead of being shoaled, is rather deeper now than it was a hundred years ago. But the deposits of refuse matter, which I trust hereafter will be regulated and controlled by the provisions of this bill, have shifted the bottom of the harbor of New York, until now the surveys which we have, and a copy of which I have here before me, turn out to be entirely incorrect, and there are to-day no correct surveys of the harbor of New York.

I asked the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors here why provision was not made in this bill for a survey of the harbor of New York in order that we might know how to spend the money before it was appropriated. He replied that he was informed by the Chief of Engineers that he had all the necessary information for that purpose. Thereupon I wrote to the Chief of Engineers upon that point, being fully satisfied that the chairman of the committee was mistaken, and that they had not the information, and in reply to my inquiry I beg leave to submit the following letter:

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS, UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, D. C., January 31, 1885.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your communication of the 29th instant in regard to a complete survey of New York Harbor, and inquiring whether the statement that the appropriation for the survey would have been reported by the River and Harbor Committee but for my statement that it was unnecessary, &c.

I beg to inclose for your information a copy of my communication to the Secretary of War, dated June 21, 1884, upon Senate bill 2176, from which it will appear that, referring to the improvement of the channel through Sandy Hook bar, the following language was used:

"Without such resurvey recommended by the board it is impossible to discuss intelligently the question of improvement, the various schemes for which object are presented from day to day.

"It is necessary, likewise, to establish the facts with regard to the statements made concerning the changes and deterioration of this harbor, which are not, however, entitled to the confidence which an accurate survey alone can give."

A survey was accordingly made of the bar, with the view to improvement, under the appropriation of July 5, 1884. The board of engineers recommended a resurvey of the harbor of New York, from the Battery to a line drawn from Navesink to Rockaway beach, as indispensable to study the changes which have taken place.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN NEWTON,
Chief of Engineers, Brig. and Bvt. Maj. Gen.

Hon. ABRAM S. HEWITT,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Now, then, before the board contemplated by the resolution of my colleague can act there must be a resurvey of the harbor of New York. Fortunately, it is not an expensive operation. I am informed by the Coast Survey that the sum of $30,000 will probably enable them to get all of the facts necessary to determine how to carry on the work for the purpose of securing the depth of water that is necessary for the commerce of the port of New York, namely, thirty feet.

Preparatory to that survey, however, the commercial bodies of New York have had a preliminary survey made, showing the present condition of the channel, which survey I hold in my hand, and copies of which are at the service of gentlemen who desire to examine it. By it it is shown that the present channel from the point of departure known as the main channel, through Gedney's Channel, is eleven miles long and is exceedingly crooked; that the Swash Channel is eight miles in length, and that the East Channel will be six miles.

It turns out on this survey that to get the depth of thirty feet in the present channel or main channel would require an excavation of 6,000,000 cubic yards, whereas to get the same in the east channel would require an excavation of only 4,600,000, and the distance would be five miles. Happily for New York and happily for this country it turns out the thing wanted to be accomplished, and the best thing to accomplish, is the cheapest thing to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to strike out the last word, and yield my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT]. I wish, however, to ask him what is the difficulty about the Coast Survey using the fund appropriated annually for them to make surveys instead of putting it in this bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I will answer the gentleman from Georgia with pleasure. I do not propose to put it in this bill. I do not propose any amendment of that sort. I supposed the appropriation for that purpose would be inserted in the sundry civil bill, in accordance with the estimate of the Department.

Mr. BLOUNT. I did not understand the gentleman to make that statement.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. We have arrived in the history of the commerce of this country at a point of departure. We have got to a point where the commerce is so great that the ships required to carry it on cheaply are too big for the harbor of New York; and there is no harbor in the country, except the harbor of New York, which can ever be made available to do this business. Man did not make the harbor of New York. It is the work of that same Almighty Power which so ordered the arrangements of nature that water could be made to flow from the great lakes to New York, and which made the harbor of New York to cover various channels and bays, so that there are at least three independent currents striving with each other to keep that harbor open for the commerce of the world. But the size of the ships to-day exceeds the capacity of the channel, so that they leave the port of New York with incomplete loads.

I have in my hand a letter, or I had it in my hand a moment ago—I will state the contents of it—a letter from the agent of the Cunard Company, saying they are compelled by the shallowness of the channel to haul off their large ships, and if the channel could be made to carry thirty feet of water they could take from fifty to sixty thousand bushels of grain more in a cargo, and thus cheapen the cost of transportation one-third, and that concerns the great West, the grain-growers of the country. It is for them we want this harbor deepened. It is for them this improvement must be made.

But before one dollar can be wisely expended there should be a resurvey at this small cost, and when the sundry civil appropriation bill comes in containing that item I should hope the House will then enable the engineers charged with this work to arrive at the information necessary to make a wise expenditure of money which my friend from Louisiana would generously give to us.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask for a vote.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The State of New York, more than any other State of this Union, raised a howl in 1882 against the river and harbor bill which appropriated eighteen millions of money. The railroad kings that live in the city of New York made opposition to it, and the President, under the influence of those railroad kings, vetoed that river and harbor bill. That veto was founded on the idea that in the bill were appropriations for small streams, insignificant harbors, and creeks and rivers upon which there was no commerce.

Now, sir, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] comes in here and tells us that the Cunard line have built their ships so large that in the winter months they can not enter the harbor of New York, and they ask this Congress for a resurvey of that harbor with a view to excavating it, not only digging out the rubbish that that city has been filling it up with, but excavating it deeper than nature left it, so as to admit not only the Cunard steamers, but the other larger steamers which are yet to be constructed.

Let it not be forgotten that in the past, before the West and the South asked for any appropriation for these small cat-fish streams and brooks, the State of New York had received millions of dollars, and to-day stands at the head of the list with $10,000,000 for its harbors to be improved for the ships of commerce as they are now, not counting your Cunard steamers which have to be hauled up in the winter. It is a new line of departure. I take this occasion to say again we should meet this issue squarely. There is but one manly way to do it; and that is to appropriate for all navigable rivers, great and small, amounts large or small according only as there is money in the Treasury. To-day we have $150,000,000 there. The railroad kings of this country sitting in New York not only influence the President into a veto, but they influence Congress; they influence the commerce of this country, and our rivers and harbors go unimproved. Why? Because the railroad kings have got commerce by the throat.

This is a new departure. The Cunard steamers can not enter New York Harbor in the winter; therefore Congress must make appropriations to dig out these harbors and deepen them for their Cunard steamers as they are now and as they are proposing to make them larger.

The question was taken on the amendment offered by Mr. KING, and it was disagreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Great Sodus Bay, New York: Continuing improvement, $10,000.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer at this point, and which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 120, insert:
"For improving the harbor at Memphis, Tenn., $75,000."

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Chairman, I regret that I am driven by the pressure of circumstances to resort to a most unpleasant expedient. For sixty days I knocked at the door of the "star chamber" where the Committee on Rivers and Harbors were preparing this bill, but I received no response. When the bill was reported to the House and I discovered that important improvements, upon which hundreds of thousands of dollars had been heretofore expended by the Government, had been altogether left out, I was astonished. Every harbor between Cairo and New Orleans was left out altogether, and I confess that when I saw the bill I was amazed.

In view of the ability, character, and standing of the gentlemen who have charge of this bill, it was a matter of great surprise and astonishment to me, and I therefore sought, I believe, every solitary member of that committee to remonstrate against their extraordinary action, and I found but one single member that did not disavow all connection with it. The chairman of the committee was the only member I was able to find that was willing to assume the responsibility of leaving to absolute and certain destruction millions of dollars' worth of property for the want of a trifling appropriation.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that the statement which the gentleman makes is not true.

Mr. YOUNG. Very well, we will see about that. How do you know it not to be true?

Mr. WILLIS. Because the committee acted upon all those harbors, including the harbor of Memphis.

Mr. YOUNG. I did not say that they did not.

Mr. WILLIS. Well, you undertook to place upon me before this House the sole responsibility for the action of the committee upon those appropriations, and I state that that is not true.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Chairman, what I have stated is literally true. I applied to every member of this committee, and they all said they were in favor of this appropriation except the chairman.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] is certainly very much mistaken.

Mr. YOUNG. And you [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] were one of them.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I certainly was, and I urged the appropriation very warmly before the committee; but when my proposition was put to a vote it was voted down.

Mr. YOUNG. That does not affect what I have stated. I state here that every member of the committee that I spoke to, except the chairman, told me that he was in favor of it.

Mr. WILLIS and Mr. BRECKINRIDGE rose.

Mr. YOUNG. Wait until I get through. When I get through, if I have made any incorrect statement you gentlemen expose it if you can.

Mr. WILLIS. Well, so far as I am concerned, I expose it now.

Mr. YOUNG. No, you do not. I stated that I spoke to every member of that committee, and all the members of the committee disavowed any responsibility for this action, and stated that they were opposed to it. That is true of every member of the committee that I spoke to, and I spoke to a number of them, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] among the number; and I now repeat, in reply to the discourteous and offensive language of the gentleman from Kentucky, that he was the only one that I talked with that assumed the responsibility. Does he deny that?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. That is a very different statement from the one the gentleman made before.

Mr. WILLIS. He said that I was the only one in the committee that was responsible for its action in this matter.

Mr. YOUNG. I did not say anything of the sort.

Now, Mr. Chairman, proceeding with what I was saying, I sought an opportunity by humbly supplicating nearly every member—I will not say every one, but a great number of the members of this committee—to be allowed five minutes, or four minutes, or two minutes, or one minute to say a few words with reference to these features of the bill to which I object. I was met with the answer—except from the chairman who did not give me an answer at all—I was met with the answer by every gentleman whom I applied to except one, "I have but an hour and I wish I had two hours." The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. JONES] was kind enough to offer to divide his time with me; but so much time had been occupied by the other members of the committee that he had none left. Therefore it is that I am driven now under this five-minute rule to speak in sections.

Mr. DUNN obtained the floor and said: I yield my time to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. YOUNG. I do not wish to be disrespectful to any of these gentlemen. I do not intend to be offensive. I have the greatest respect for all the members of this committee. The chairman has received many courtesies at my hands, and I was glad to extend them, for personally I have great respect for him. But I say it is an outrage upon any member of this House, any Representative on this floor, when vital interests of his constituents are at stake to give him no opportunity to be heard upon the floor of this House.

No Representative in this body should be driven to the necessity of applying to the Senate in order to secure that which it is his right to have in this House. I am told by these gentlemen that I can get my amendment on in the Senate. I am not a member of the Senate—perhaps I ought to be, but I am not. [Laughter.] I am a member of this House, and I intend to insist upon the rights of my constituents here and not to appeal to the Senate except as a dernier ressort.

I have heard no explanation from any of these gentlemen as to the reason it was found necessary to make an appropriation for Cairo, which was never asked and for which I believe no estimate was made, and leave out all the harbors from Cairo to New Orleans. I have failed to hear any explanation from any member of the committee as to the reason why New Orleans was so generously provided for, after passing over a stretch of that river of more than six hundred miles, where millions of dollars' worth of property was liable to be destroyed if this appropriation was not promptly made and wisely applied.

At my own town, if my memory serves me correctly, $474,000 have already been expended in the prosecution of this class of work. The engineers, in their report and estimates of the present year, ask that this work shall be continued with an appropriation of $75,000. From my knowledge of the work, of the topography of the river and the land at that point, I am enabled to assert that if this work be abandoned now, as these gentlemen of the committee propose, the whole of it will be swept away at the next rise in the Mississippi River. The custom-house, a structure that cost the Government nearly $600,000, is liable to be swept away, unless the river front, which is rapidly caving into the bosom of the stream, shall be protected. The case is the same with Greenville and Natchez, and perhaps other towns on the Lower Mississippi.

I submit to the House whether it is wise statesmanship or sound economy to leave unprotected work that has cost $474,000, when the engineers estimate that only $75,000 is necessary to preserve it from destruction. I have not heard from any member of the committee in all their discussion any explanation of the necessity of pursuing this course, and I have heard the most objectionable feature in this bill denounced by but one member of the committee. I refer to the extraordinary proposition to turn over our whole work of internal improvements, to revolutionize it entirely, and give it over to the control and dictation of a single individual.

Mr. Chairman, I desire that the House shall understand this proposition and the necessity for this appropriation. In the brief time allowed under the five-minute rule I can not present it as much in detail and as strongly as I would desire. I shall seek opportunity during the further progress of the debate to pursue this investigation and submit additional remarks. I believe my time has now expired.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, if the language of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG], uttered in the presence of this committee a few minutes ago, meant anything it meant that the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and he alone, was responsible for the failure to make an appropriation for Memphis Harbor; and he supplemented that statement with another, which he now withdraws, that he had applied to all the other members of this committee and that I was the only one whom he found opposed to this proposition.

Now what is the history of this Memphis appropriation? Last year the Committee on Rivers and Harbors gave him—gave every gentleman and every delegation—all the time that they asked. As the result of that the committee concluded not to make a special appropriation for the city of Memphis, or any other city on the Mississippi River. But the gentleman and his friends went to the other end of the Capitol and under a statement that there was a public building endangered by the rise of the Mississippi River they succeeded in getting what no other city, no other harbor of the Mississippi River secured, and that is an appropriation of $200,000.

In our committee we believed that appropriation was largely intended to protect private property in Memphis, and under the solemnity of our oath, representing the whole people, we saw no warrant of law to give hundreds of thousands of dollars for the protection of private property of a city. But when the question was presented there and was stated that the custom-house was involved, the committee of conference yielded to that suggestion and put it in the bill.

In the present bill the estimate comes forward for $75,000 additional. The committee took it under consideration. They found an estimate for half a dozen harbors of $2,000,000. Three of these harbors were in my own State, that at Paducah, that at Columbus, and that at Hickman. The committee having given to the improvement of the Mississippi the sum of $2,800,000, having given to the Mississippi River nearly one-third of all the appropriations in this bill, and having a commission to whom they intrusted the expenditure of this money, took the position that that commission was either competent or it was incompetent. If it were incompetent, it ought to be disbanded and its life ended at once. If it were competent, it could take into consideration the harbors at Memphis or at Vicksburg or anywhere else. And in so far as the improvement of these harbors was necessary to the navigation of that river, they have the right under the law to appropriate all this sum of nearly $3,000,000.

If the gentleman desired this committee to go beyond that, then he desired that which we in our judgment believed we had no right to do. We gave this appropriation for the navigation of the Mississippi River, and I say to him, whether he be a friend of the Mississippi River or not, and that I doubt—but I say to him, assuming he is a friend of the present method of improving the Mississippi River, that if you want to handicap it, if you want to destroy it on this floor, then have your appropriations for harbors at Hickman, and Columbus, and Vicksburg, and Memphis, and all along the line made so each will have an appropriation of fifty or one hundred thousand dollars, and the people's representatives will end the whole business.

I say to him now that in that committee, if I am permitted to disclose a committee's secret, there was not one-fifth, or more than one-fifth, that did not agree with me. I could have been silent, as the gentleman suggests. I, as chairman, was the only one of the committee who did not as a matter of fact vote, but had I voted I should have unquestionably indorsed the judgment of three-fourths of our committee, and that was that this appropriation for Memphis should not be made specific, but should be left to the judgment or discretion of these engineers who have charge of the whole river. I reply again that his statement undertaking to fix upon me the entire responsibility is untrue, unjust, and ungenerous in the extreme.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. YOUNG. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. Discussion on the present amendment is exhausted. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Tennessee directly, but he is compelled to keep his promise made to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON].

Mr. YOUNG. But I wish to say a word right here, and I appeal to the gentleman from West Virginia to yield to me for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from West Virginia yield the floor?

Mr. GIBSON. I do when the gentleman makes a personal appeal to me.

Mr. YOUNG. Now, I do not think the gentleman from Kentucky intends to apply to me the offensive epithet he has used. I should like to know if that is his purpose; whether he intends to assert before the House I have deliberately asserted a falsehood.

Mr. WILLIS. I say if the gentleman undertakes to put upon me the responsibility of refusing this appropriation he does state that which is untrue.

Mr. YOUNG. I have explained already that I was told by other gentlemen they were in favor of the proposition, and you were the only one I think who was opposed to it. I made that statement.

Mr. GIBSON. But you do not state that on your own knowledge.

Mr. YOUNG. He knew very well I did not make that statement on my own knowledge; but I do not wish any question about this matter. I do not want any member of the House to stand on the floor and declare that I have deliberately stated a falsehood. I never would do it myself. It is not the place to do it. I am able to take care of myself here, and I do not care about any such thing going out in the way of imputation against me. Now I wish to ask the gentleman from Kentucky to state whether that is so.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman understands exactly what I intended.

Mr. YOUNG. I do not.

Mr. WILLIS. I will state again, and if the gentleman has not understood me I think the House will understand, that if the gentleman undertook to say that I was the only member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors that opposed this proposition, and that upon me rested the entire responsibility for its rejection, while I am perfectly willing to assume the responsibility of it, he states what is not true.

Mr. YOUNG. Then I have to say in reply that upon his assumption he undertakes to brand me as uttering a falsehood upon this floor.

Mr. WILLIS. No; I did not intend to go to that point.

Mr. YOUNG. Then you had better state clearly what you mean.

Mr. WILLIS. That if you stated what I said, then I stand by what I said.

Mr. YOUNG. Then the gentleman assumes a hypothetical case.

Mr. WILLIS. I think I have been very clear in my statement.

Mr. YOUNG. The gentleman asserts a hypothetical case, that "if" I said a thing, and upon that hypothetical assumption he assumes to brand falsehood upon me.

Mr. WILLIS. If the gentleman has not made such a statement then my language does not apply.

Mr. YOUNG. You know that I never made it.

Mr. WILLIS. Then of course the language does not apply.

Mr. YOUNG. Now if the gentleman can listen courteously, and I shall demean myself courteously to him and the House, I desire to say a few words in reply to the argument of the gentleman directed to this feature of the bill.

I understand him to say that it was his belief, and it is a matter of no consequence what he chances to believe personally about it, that this appropriation of $200,000 which the Senate gave last year was obtained for the protection and improvement of private property.

As reputable gentlemen as the gentleman from Kentucky or any other gentleman upon this floor, representing the public sentiment of my city, representing the city government, representing its great steamboat and commercial interests, were here in the city of Washington, and stated to that gentleman in my presence the absolute necessity for the making of this appropriation in order to protect the banks of the Mississippi River at that point, where further caving would ultimately involve a loss of more than $2,000,000 unless checked.

In vindication of that people and of those gentlemen who appeared before the committee I have to say to the House now that I do not believe there is a single individual in Memphis, and I am certain I do not represent the wishes of any such, who entertains such an opinion, who desires that an appropriation shall be included in this bill for his personal benefit or for the protection of private property any further than such property may be necessarily protected in the efforts to protect the public property.

This is the most important harbor on the Mississippi River between Saint Louis and New Orleans. It is the commercial emporium of the Lower Mississippi Valley. More than 600,000 bales of cotton are shipped annually from that point. Seventeen hundred water craft land at its wharves. Nearly 40,000 seamen and steamboat-men man these crafts and earn their living by it.

Heretofore one and a half millions of dollars' worth of property has been destroyed in Memphis by reason of the current of the river being diverted from the Arkansas shore to the Tennessee shore before Congress made any appropriation whatever to arrest the evil. Some years ago upon estimates of the engineers an appropriation was made, which has been kept up continuously ever since, and a large amount of property, which before now would in all human probability have gone into the bosom of the river and been swept out to the Gulf, has been protected. The engineers estimate that $75,000 is necessary to complete the work.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I took occasion upon the introduction of this bill into the House to declare that I was not only not responsible for any of these radical features, but that I intended to oppose them here in the committee. I thought then that they were calculated to shock the common sense of the country and arouse its indignation against the report. Unfortunately for this bill, and unfortunately for the great objects in view, it did succeed in arousing the sentiment of this House against it. But now I want to appeal to the members of this body, who have at heart the interests of the rivers and harbors or the development of our internal commerce, to know, after the committee has receded from every single one of these objectionable features, why a discussion should go on that is based simply upon these propositions?

Eads is entirely out of the bill. Sandy Bay has been eliminated from it. We are progressing as rapidly with the consideration of the bill as the Committee of the Whole will allow us under the rules of the House to proceed.

The statement has been repeatedly made here that the committee was not willing and did not hear members of the House in the preparation of this bill. I want to say here now, and put it upon the record of this House, that there is not a member of the House who has been denied the privilege of being heard by the present Committee on Rivers and Harbors. During this present term of Congress every member of this House who applied to be heard has been heard. At the former session of this Congress there was not one who wished to be heard and was not heard.

For five long months this committee sat almost day and night listening to the complaints of everybody and to the applications of everybody; and then when the short session came on, and it was determined that this committee could not in justice to itself undertake to go into new enterprises, we then said, having heard the members of this House once upon their projects, having heard all the delegations fully at the long session, we would not be discharging our duty to the House if we would undertake to delay the consideration of this bill. Many members talked to me privately as they did to other members of the committee. I explained the matter to them; and I challenge one single member of this House to get up and say that he at that time protested against it as a wrong or outrage against him. On the contrary, it was universally acknowledged and conceded that it was the only course we could pursue.

Now, one word further in relation to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG]. I protest here against the appropriation of a solitary dollar to any landing on the Mississippi River. Those landings are not harbors in any sense of the word. They are not harbors such as any Government can or ought to improve. They are mere private landings established for inland commerce, and they do not come within the purview of a river and harbor bill. If this House were to undertake to establish landings and improve landings upon the inland streams, upon the Ohio River, the Mississippi River, and the Missouri River, there would not be money enough left in the Treasury of the United States, after the pockets of over 50,000,000 of people had been drained, to carry out such improvements. It would be a wrong and an outrage upon the people. It would destroy the whole object of the system of internal improvements; and as I said before about these other propositions, it would shock the common sense of the country and arouse its just indignation against us.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. YOUNG. I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] desired to offer an amendment to the paragraph. He was proposing to offer it when the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] rose. The Chair will now entertain that amendment.

The Clerk read Mr. PAYNE's proposed amendment, as follows:

In line 120, strike out "$10,000" and insert "$20,000;" so that it will read: "Improving harbor at Great Sodus Bay: Continuing improvement, $20,000."

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment in good faith, and I desire the attention of the committee for the first five minutes that I have trenched upon their time to hear a little something about this harbor at Great Sodus. There can be no doubt about its commercial importance. It is at the terminus of the Northern Railroad of Pennsylvania, their line running from Great Sodus through the States of New York and Pennsylvania by the way Williamsport and Harrisburg to Baltimore and Washington. It is a great coal-carrying road, and this railroad company intends to make the port at Great Sodus the principal point for the shipment of coal both for Canada and the great lakes in the West. By the way, I want to call the attention of the committee again to the fact that the poor little Dominion of Canada is spending millions of dollars to provide a canal around the Niagara Falls in order to draw away a portion of the commerce that naturally belongs to the United States, and take it down to Montreal and Quebec. I say the little Dominion of Canada has lately expended millions of dollars to increase the depth of the Welland Canal so that boats drawing fourteen feet of water can pass around it. That necessitates the improvement of the principal harbors on the shore of Lake Ontario. But the committee seem to have overlooked the fact that this board of engineers recommend that such harbors as Charlotte, Great Sodus, Little Sodus, and Ogdensburg should immediately have their capacities increased so that vessels coming through this canal can enter these harbors.

The committee in the first instance determined to appropriate for the improvement of the Great Sodus Harbor the munificent sum of $5,000. Well, I got the door open far enough to find out on what theory they did it; and I was told that the commerce of this harbor would not warrant any larger expenditure. And it seemed to be a new revelation to the committee when they turned to the collector's report and found there was actually collected during the last year at this port the sum of $19,400 in customs. They concluded that it was a harbor important enough to increase the sum from $5,000 to $10,000. They told me, as I presume they will tell this committee, that they were only allowing 25 per cent. of the engineer's estimate; and yet they have allowed $12,000,000 in this bill upon $32,000,000 of estimates of the engineers, and at the same time they tell this committee they have stricken out one hundred and forty harbors that the engineers have made recommendations for.

Now why not exercise a little common sense in regard to this bill? Why not pick out the important harbors that are nearing completion and appropriate the money necessary to complete them, and try to keep pace with the Dominion of Canada in our internal improvements?

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, in behalf of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, I can only repeat that we have allowed to this harbor the same proportion that was allowed to four-fifths of the harbors of the country. The estimate of the engineer is for $40,000. The committee has allowed one-fourth of that amount, which is $10,000. They have on hand the sum of $14,308, which, with the $10,000, would give them about $25,000. The committee in the last Congress, on a bill much larger than the present one, reported for this improvement the sum of $10,000, the same amount that is given in this bill. It may not be all that they could use, but it is all that could be given consistently with the demands of other points of equal if not of greater importance. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I yield my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, it is true that there is available for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, the sum of $14,308.85; but I ask the chairman of the committee and the members of this Committee of the Whole what that has to do with the amount that is to be appropriated for the fiscal year commencing on the 1st day of July, 1885? Why, sir, that $14,000 is already contracted for, and the work will be done and the money expended before the 30th of June, 1885; and why is it that this Committee on Rivers and Harbors will continually harp upon the amounts that are still available for the fiscal year ending on the 30th day of June next when we are making appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886? It is an insult to the intelligence of this Congress for them to continually try to defeat these amendments that are offered in good faith upon any such flimsy pretext as that.

Mr. Chairman, the engineer further reports that about five hundred linear feet of the east and four hundred linear feet of the west pier superstructure is badly decayed, and will require to be rebuilt within the next two years at an estimated cost of $12,000. Also, that the east breakwater will require some repairs. And these repairs are required within two years of the time when this report was made. The time will be nearly up when the fiscal year for which we are now appropriating expires; and yet this committee do not propose to provide a dollar of this $12,000 that is necessary to protect the work already done.

I suppose they intend to wait until, by the action of the winds and waves, the work is swept away, unless some immediate occasion for doing something should arise, and then, instead of appropriating $12,000, we shall have to appropriate $25,000, $40,000, or perhaps $50,000 to repair the breaks. I suppose that is the idea of the committee.

Mr. PAYNE. I wish I could have two or three minutes more.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words, and I yield my time to the gentleman from New York; but I wish that the gentleman would first answer a question. I understood him to say a while ago that he had got the door of the committee-room open far enough to get this amount increased from $5,000 to $10,000. He is the first member of this House who appears to have succeeded in getting before that exclusive committee, and I wish he would tell us how he did it. [Laughter]

Mr. PAYNE. Well, Mr. Chairman, perhaps a word of explanation is due to the members of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. What I meant to say was that I went around and saw the members of the committee individually and told them my story. I had also permission to see for about five minutes, in the committee-room, the engineer's report; and from the recollection of that which I could carry away I wrote out and presented to a member of the committee a statement which I suppose went before the full committee, though I am not informed on that subject. But the report itself I could not get hold of to find out what the engineers had recommended until the bill was reported to the House.

Now one thing further: The engineers say that the extension of the east breakwater so as to close up the gap where sand is drifting and where a good deal of dredging is required to be done will cost about $2,000. This, added to the $12,000, makes $14,000 that is imperatively necessary to protect the work that has already been done. Still, the committee makes no provision for the great commerce coming to this port from the lakes and from the Welland Canal. Why, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that there ought to be no doubt or hesitation about ingrafting on this bill this important amendment. It seems to me that we can all vote for it with a clear conscience, because we believe that this is a measure in the interest of rivers and harbors, in the interest of internal improvements, in the interest of providing water ways that shall furnish some protection against what gentlemen are pleased to call the "railroad kings" and the "great monopolies."

Mr. WILLIS. I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] withdraw his amendment to strike out the last three words?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I withdraw it.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. PAYNE, there were—ayes 78, noes 72.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WILLIS and Mr. PAYNE were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 78, noes 92.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Gowanus Bay, New York: Continuing improvement, $5,000.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend by adding after the paragraph just read the clause which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Olcott Harbor, New York: Continuing improvement, $5,000.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I desire to know whether the offering of this amendment to come in after the lines just read will cut off debate on those lines? I have a substantial amendment which I desire to offer to those lines.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is being considered not by lines, but by paragraphs. This is an amendment to the paragraph. When it is disposed of a further amendment to the paragraph will be in order.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. When my friend from New York [Mr. STEVENS] interposed I was seeking to offer an amendment to the appropriation for improving Gowanus Bay. I do not wish to lose my right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests that the gentleman from New York [Mr. STEVENS] allow his colleague [Mr. ROBINSON] to offer his amendment now.

Mr. STEVENS. Certainly. My amendment is an independent one. I will offer it hereafter at the proper time. I only desire not to lose my right.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I reserve a point of order against the amendment just read.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not pending. It has been withdrawn for the time being.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I move to amend by making the appropriation for continuing the improvement of the harbor at Gowanus Bay $20,000.

We have been trying for a considerable period to get improvements at that place, and have been from time to time delayed or denied. All that part of the bay of New York, which needs large improvements, has been kept down to very small sums, hardly worth accepting, so small indeed that we would rather no appropriations had been made. I might mention Canarsie Bay and others for which the amounts appropriated have been very meager.

Gowanus Bay is a very important part of the harbor of New York, and there is an immense commerce upon Gowanus Creek, extending a considerable distance above Hamilton avenue bridge. We believe there ought to be an appropriation to dredge that canal above the bridge, because the immense amount of United States business above that point should be provided for by the Government, and the cost should not be put upon the city of Brooklyn. We are not now in a position, however, to urge any appropriation for the canal or creek. But for Gowanus Bay the committee here propose to give us $5,000. The original proposition was "to dredge a channel from the 18-foot contour outside the bay to the drawbridge at Hamilton avenue" at an estimated cost of $182,850. The report of the engineer states:

The amount expended at the close of the year ending June 30, 1883, was $40,124.31, and a channel dredged 1,826 feet long, 100 feet wide, and 18 feet deep at mean low water.

The amount expended during the year ending June 30, 1884, was $19,661.82.

These expenditures, amounting to about $60,000, leave $120,000 of the original estimate unappropriated. The Engineer-in-Chief states in this report that the amount which can be profitably expended during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, is $50,000. Yet this committee proposes to give us the small sum of $5,000 for this vast improvement. Why, sir, we ask nothing for the canal above the bridge, upon which the Engineer-in-Chief states there is a very large amount of tonnage. That canal, although we ask nothing for it, has more commerce than one-half the rivers and harbors mentioned in this bill.

I do not believe there are ten rivers on the whole bill of as much importance as Gowanus Creek above the bridge, for which we do not ask anything.

I ask to make an amendment—and I hope the chairman will allow me to make it—that is, $20,000 for the improvement of Gowanus Harbor. I hope he will allow some increase and not keep us down; allow us some decent sum, so we can go on and make some improvements, instead of giving driblets of appropriations in this way.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, it was my intention to offer an amendment in line 22, and to call attention to the fact the committee had evidently made a mistake in putting in $5,000 for Gowanus Bay when the engineers recommended $50,000. I will be charitable and suppose the committee intended the word "five" for "fifty," because the engineers' report from which the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] has just read states that $50,000 can be properly expended for this important harbor. I had intended to contrast this harbor for which $5,000 is recommended in this bill with Hingham Harbor, for which $6,000, by the action of yesterday, was appropriated. I had intended to call the attention of this committee to the fact that with a small sum of money a depth of water varying from six to eight feet had been deepened to eighteen feet, and a channel of one hundred feet wide had been made at Gowanus Bay, whereas at Hingham they have to-day in that channel more than eight feet of water, while the work they propose to do there is to carry that channel to the immense length of nine miles, which seems to be entirely for the benefit of that one steamboat there to which I have already referred.

Now let me call the attention of this committee to the report of the engineer, where he says on page 4 of this special report:

The proposed improvement consists in restoring to the upper portion of the channel the width obtained by dredging in 1875, and giving it a depth of ten feet at mean low water, which is an increase of two feet on the depth formerly obtained. It is also proposed to remove the ledge lying about midway in the lower channel between Chandler's and Ragged Islands.

Further on the assistant engineer in charge of the work says:

The least width of the channel excavated in 1876 was one hundred feet; it therefore has diminished in width more than half. Above the wharf of the steamboat company no channel of eight feet depth exists now; the average depth in the original 50-foot wide channel does not exceed now three and a half feet.

And a little further on suggests:

During spring tides the water frequently falls 1.5 feet, and at times nearly three feet below mean low water, so that but five and one-half feet, and occasionlly not much over four feet depth of water can be counted on.

He says on page 6:

Total estimated cost of improvements, $18,750.

The above estimate appears high, but is not so considering the rather unfavorable circumstances under which the work has to be done, among which the great distance to which the excavated material will have to be carried, partly through crooked and narrow channels, out to sea about nine miles or more, is the most prominent.

We have appropriated only a third of that amount by the action of yesterday. We have given $6,000 on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] for that harbor at Hingham where only $18,000 is recommended, and where there is but little commerce.

Now, sir, I am in favor of improving harbors where there is little commerce. Do not understand me to say we ought not to have done that; but I am astonished how unjust and how unfair the discrimination is in this bill. Where it is said by the Engineer Department $50,000 could be expended profitably this year the committee put in the bill only $5,000, scarcely enough to pay for the running expenses of the machinery.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON].

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 11, noes 62.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I do not wish to detain this committee, but I think we ought to have the vote on that by tellers, as I understand there is no quorum, but I ask for tellers not for the purpose of delaying the committee, but this is a meritorious case and deserves a vote.

The CHAIRMAN appointed Mr. ROBINSON, of New York, and Mr. WILLIS as tellers.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. After what has been said to me by the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STEVENS. I move the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 122 insert:

"Improvement of Olcott Harbor, New York: Continuing improvement, $5,000."

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, again, in the discharge of what I believe to be my duty as a Representative upon this floor, I have been compelled to ask the indulgence of the committee while I shall explain to it the objects and purposes of this amendment. The harbor for which this appropriation is asked has had already expended upon it by the General Government the sum of $118,000. The amount needed to complete it, according to the report of the engineers, is $30,000. That amount was asked for last year, but the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in their judgment decided to make no appropriation whatever, and consequently it had nothing to depend upon except the small unexpended balance coming over from previous years. The engineer in charge of this work says:

There will be no operations at this harbor during the present season, since the funds are practically exhausted.

The engineer also goes on to say that the appropriation of $30,000 asked for is to be applied to the extension and maintenance of the piers and the deepening of the channel between the piers.

It is true, sir, that the commerce at this harbor is not very large. I believe there was something over 100,000 packages of merchandise handled there last year. The only amount I ask in this amendment, as will be seen, is not the $30,000 recommended by the engineers, nor one-fourth of it, which I understand the Committee on Rivers and Harbors seem inclined to recommend in accordance with the report of the engineers, but I only ask one-sixth of the sum, in order that the recommendation of the engineer, to wit, that the improvements already made may be preserved, shall be carried out.

I do not ask this, sir, in any spirit of criticism upon the action of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors; nor do I desire to be called an obstructionist because, having been denied an opportunity of presenting the claims of this harbor in any other way than before the Committee of the Whole House, I think it is a right not only that I have, but that every member of the committee has, to present the claims of their respective constituents and the claims of harbors in their districts in Committee of the Whole. In that spirit alone have I offered this amendment, and I hope it will be accepted.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, in one word I desire to say that this harbor had a full hearing in the last Congress as well as in this. The gentleman himself appeared before the committee then.

Mr. STEVENS. Not this year.

Mr. WILLIS. Not this year; I refer to the last session of Congress. It was rejected in the last session, and was rejected also in this, simply for the reason that its commercial statistics were so small. There were only 19,000 packages of merchandise and some 91,000 pounds of provisions as the whole of the exports from that point. The whole revenue derived was $82.90, while the whole imports reached $118.

Now we were compelled to make some discrimination as to the nationality and importance of these harbors, and simply for the reason that it did not come up to the measure of what was required as a national improvement we felt compelled to reject the application to make an appropriation for this point; and I may say it was excluded reluctantly from this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Little Sodus Bay, New York: Continuing improvement, $10,000.

Mr. PAYNE. I move to strike out "ten," in line 128, and insert "fifteen;" so that it will read:

Continuing improvement, $15,000.

This harbor is in a situation very similar to the Big Sodus Harbor, of which I spoke a few moments ago. It is at the terminus of the Lehigh Valley Railroad, a road running across the States of New York and Pennsylvania to Philadelphia, and is the outlet on the lakes of the great Lehigh Valley coal mines. It has a larger commerce than Big Sodus. The collections from import duties were $23,589 for the last fiscal year. But otherwise the cases are almost exactly parallel. There is about the same sum left over, which it is necessary to use to pay for contracts already existing before the 30th day of June next. In every other respect I think it is exactly similar.

Now, I have suggested the sum of $15,000 in this amendment not because of the impression that seems to prevail in the minds of the committee that if we add five or ten thousand dollars to this bill in the way of an amendment the whole thing is so weak that that small sum might make it topple over and that consequently we must stand by the committee and support the bill and must not increase it by any small amount which may be absolutely necessary for fear that the bill could not carry it, but because I believe that unless this bill is amended in these particulars, and unless some objectionable features are stricken from the bill which are already there, so that the aggregate will be below the $12,000,000, it will not furnish a bill that has a chance to pass this Congress. We have already stricken out $100,000 for Sandy Bay. Now, I want to put in a little for these harbors about the country which are of national importance and which have a commerce and which are harbors that need improvement, and let every member not only of the Committee of the Whole but every member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors vote his honest convictions, and not feel compelled to stand by a report of the committee when it must be seen that that report is made without receiving all the light upon the subject which is obtainable and when this body can see that the committee was wrong and that the amendment offered is right.

The question being taken on Mr. PAYNE's amendment, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 56, noes 67.

Mr. STEVENS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 128 insert the following:
"Improving Wilson Harbor, New York: Continuing improvement, $5,000."

Mr. STEVENS. This is another of the same class of harbors for which I have offered the two previous amendments. I only desire to state in connection with this matter that the amount of money already expended here is $49,866. The amount required according to the estimate of the engineer to complete it is $50,000. The amount he recommends to be appropriated this year, or which he states can be economically expended during this year, is $30,000.

I have offered this amendment in order to preserve the work. All I ask for in the amendment is $5,000, simply to preserve in repair the work already done.

In answer to the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, I will state that the revenue received at that port by the United States collector is $932. And in further answer to the objection the gentleman offered to making an appropriation for Olcott Harbor, I will say that I find by reference to the bill which the committee have presented that for the harbor of Fairport, Ohio, where the magnificent sum of $87.85 was collected during the last twelve months, the committee recommend an appropriation of $5,000. At Black Lake, Mich., there was a revenue in one year of $212.57, and the committee recommend an appropriation by their bill of $6,000.

And so I could go through the bill, taking up item after item. But I do not desire to do it, merely calling the attention of the committee to the fact that the objection offered by the honorable chairman of the committee in regard to Olcott Harbor does not prevail against this, and that it does obtain against quite a number of harbors for which he has reported in the bill presented quite liberal appropriations.

Mr. WILLIS. In one word, I desire to say this was fully considered at the last session. The gentleman had a hearing, and by a vote of the committee, on which his own State was represented, it was excluded. The reason given is here stated:

The question is of growing importance whether the United States is to serve improvements made by the Government originally but now lying inside the shore line and in use or subject to use by riparian owners for docks, &c., or whether such original Government work is to be preserved by the local authorities or parties most in interest.

The question is whether this harbor is to be improved for private use by public money; and the committee did not believe it ought to be.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to say in answer to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] that that is the very principle that I would like to see decided by this House; and that is whether after the Government of the United States shall have during a long series of years been making these appropriations, and shall have made very comfortable harbors in most instances for the use not merely of the riparian owners but for the use of all the people, especially of those who may happen to have ships and vessels of various kinds doing business on the waters and rivers where these improvements have been made—whether Congress shall now discontinue those works. This is the very question which the people want to have understood and settled—whether by this Congress there is to be an abandonment of all the precedents of past Congresses, and whether this burden is to be thrown on the individuals who happen to be living contiguous to these improvements which have been made in years past. We want to know what the sentiment of this Congress is, and whether the rights of the people which have been protected in years past by Congress are in future to be ignored.

The question being taken on the amendment offered by Mr. STEVENS, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Improving harbor at Oswego, N. Y.: Continuing improvement, $50,000.

Mr. NUTTING. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 134 strike out "$50,000" and insert "$95,000;" so that the clause will read:
"Improving harbor at Oswego, N. Y.: Continuing improvement, $95,000."

Mr. NUTTING. I offer this amendment with the belief that it ought to be allowed. The harbor of Oswego holds from the seventh to the tenth place among the harbors of the United States as regards the collection of duties. It is the principal harbor of Lake Ontario, and nearly at the foot of lake navigation.

The report of the engineers for the last year asks Congress to appropriate $70,000 for repairs and continuation of work on this harbor. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors has thought fit to give us $50,000.

But, Mr. Chairman, allow me to say that since the report of the engineers was made a storm came upon the works of that harbor and two hundred and fifty feet of the pier were swept away; the entire pier of this harbor is, if I recollect correctly, about three-fourths of a mile in length, and shuts in the water of the lake to the extent of one hundred acres.

This is not all. By this break in the piers of the harbor of Oswego, which occurred in December last, not only the Government works themselves, which have cost the Government about $1,500,000, are in danger, but the immense property on the water front of the city, to the extent of a million dollars and probably more, is in danger of destruction. I formulated a resolution to be passed through the Senate that a survey be made of these damages, and a survey was made under instructions of the Senate.

This damage which I have described to the House is said by the Engineer, in answer to the Senate resolution, to amount to $45,000; and in speaking of the necessity of this appropriation in a letter to the mayor he says substantially that it is absolutely necessary for the preservation of the public works at the harbor of the city of Oswego.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the members of this committee will look at this matter for a few minutes as business men, I am sure there will not be a single dissenting vote against the amendment that I have offered. The customs district of Oswego has within the last twenty years collected nearly or quite $20,000000, for the Treasury of the United States. We have received there for all our public works less than the interest upon the money which we have collected and put into the Treasury. Yet now, when the United States engineers, under their official oaths, have said that it is necessary for the preservation of all this work, when they have said that it is absolutely necessary in order that the harbor of Oswego may be kept open, that $45,000 shall be added to the original estimation, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors simply sit down and in substance say that this harbor shall not have the money.

Mr. Chairman, I warn this House and the country that if that appropriation be not made, damage to the amount of more than a million dollars will be done within the next six months within the harbor of Oswego by the storms.

Do gentlemen realize the importance of this harbor? The tonnage of Oswego last year was over 350,000; the amount of lumber shipped into that harbor from Canada over 187,000,000 feet in the year 1883. The amount of coal which is shipped from that harbor to other ports and other countries was about a quarter of a million tons in the same year. The grain of all kinds which came to that port in 1883 was nearly four and a half million bushels, and the amount of customs collected that year direct—saying nothing about bonded goods—was nearly $700,000. The value of imports was nearly six million and a half of dollars, and the value of exports about $2,000,000.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I do not dispute, and I am sure that no member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors will dispute, the commercial importance of the harbor of Oswego, and the committee have endeavored to be strictly just to its claims. The estimate of the engineer of the amount that could be profitably expended was $70,000. In the cases of fully four-fifths of the harbors of the country the committee has allowed one-fourth of the estimated amount, but in this case, instead of allowing one-fourth of the estimate, which would have been something over $16,000, the committee have allowed $50,000.

Mr. NUTTING. Does the gentleman mean that of the $50,000 $45,000 is to be appropriated for the mending of the piers?

Mr. WILLIS. I was about to come to the point. In the last Congress this House appropriated for the harbor of Oswego $40,000, and the Senate added $40,000, making $80,000; so that, if the appropriation in this bill be allowed, that harbor will have on hand $130,000. In the year preceding they were able to expend only $54,000. So that, even allowing for these improvements, they will not be able, gentlemen of the committee, to expend more than the amount of $140,000 in the next two fiscal years—$70,000 per year. I ask for a vote.

Mr. NUTTING. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the pending amendment in order that I may have an opportunity to answer briefly the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

I was as unfortunate as other members of the House in my efforts to get into the room of that committee so as to lay before them my views as to the necessity for this appropriation for the harbor of Oswego, but I did place in the hands of some of the members of the committee (who were generous enough to listen to what I had to say and to receive the papers I had to present) evidence to show that this money, which the chairman of the committee says is now on hand, has been already expended under contracts, and that before the end of this fiscal year it will be entirely expended, and there will not be a dollar on hand with which to carry on work from June, 1885, to June, 1886.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if there is any legislative body in the world that ought to be governed by business principles in its legislation it is the Congress of the United States. Where would you have got the money you are now appropriating if it had not been for such harbors as that of Oswego, which have been continually bringing into the Treasury of the United States the money upon which we are now drawing for the improvement of the harbors and the commerce of the country? And yet, when the time comes that we need some of this money to maintain and keep in existence the harbor of Oswego, and when we come here with the sworn report of the Government engineers that it is necessary to have $45,000 more in order to mend the piers in that harbor so that the property there and the harbor itself may not be exposed to damage and ruin, this committee refuses to make the appropriation.

Any business man owning these piers and this harbor, if he found this break in the piers, would at once expend every dollar necessary to repair them. Yet this Congress, when the whole matter is laid before it time after time, refuses to make the appropriations which it should make as legislators for the nation. I ask the members of this House to vote this amendment of $45,000 which the engineers say is necessary to carry on the work at this point, and especially to preserve the work already placed there by the Government.

Mr. THOMAS. Does not this bill provide more than the $45,000 required to repair the damage?

Mr. NUTTING. It provides $5,000 more; and I suppose the gentleman would have us credit that $5,000 upon the $70,000 additional, which the engineers have stated in their annual report to be necessary for the preservation and continuation of the works there.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. NUTTING, there were—ayes 73, noes 84.

Mr. NUTTING. I make the point that no quorum has voted and call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. NUTTING and Mr. BRECKINRIDGE were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 84, noes 80.

So the amendment of Mr. NUTTING was adopted.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I reserve the right to have a vote in the House on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not necessary.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Saugerties, N. Y.: Continuing improvement, $5,000.

Mr. WILLIS. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BLACKBURN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HAMMOND reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8130) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1793) to amend section 4434 of title 52 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning commerce and navigation and the regulation of steam-vessels.

The message further informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment the joint resolution (H. Res. 309) extending the permission granted Maj. William Ludlow by the act of February 28, 1883, to accept a civil position.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to trespass upon the business of the Pension Committees; but I will ask unanimous consent that at the close of to-night's session the House take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

A MEMBER. Let us hear the request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] asks unanimous consent that at the close of the session to-night the House take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning. Is there objection?

Mr. VALENTINE and others objected.

Mr. CONVERSE. I move that the House now take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I ask that the order under which the House meets on Friday night be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pending that, the Chair will ask consent to present several executive communications.

GOVERNMENT RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a detailed account of receipts and expenditures of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

SKIPTON CREEK, MARYLAND.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, inclosing report of the Chief of Engineers of an examination of Skipton Creek, Maryland; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted in the following cases:

To Mr. HART, for the remainder of the day, on account of important business.

To Mr. STEVENS, for to-morrow, on account of important business.

To Mr. BAGLEY, until Monday next, on account of business.

To Mr. FIEDLER, until Tuesday next, on account of sickness.

To Mr. WEMPLE, until Monday next, on account of important business.

To Mr. BRUMM, until Tuesday next, on account of sickness.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

A bill (S. 674) to authorize the purchase of additional grounds for the United States court-house and post-office building at Springfield, Ill.; and

A bill (S. 2168) for the relief of the executrix of Ayres P. Merrill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, the House, in pursuance of its standing order, takes a recess till 8 o'clock p. m.; the session of to-night, at which the gentleman from New York, Mr. BAGLEY, will preside, being for the consideration of pension business.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m., Mr. BAGLEY in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

BUSINESS BY UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire. I was not present when the committees were called, the only time they were called since the last meeting of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and therefore I ask unanimous consent that I may make two reports, which I was instructed by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to submit.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I do not object, but I would like to know whether this can be done under the order of this evening session.

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire. It has been done before in two or three instances, I think.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Then if it has been done before I shall not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Anything can be done by unanimous consent.

There was no objection.

BENJAMIN P. LOWELL.

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 6310) granting a pension to Benjamin P. Lowell; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CYNTHIA MARTIN AND CATHERINE STOVER.

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 2804) for the relief of Cynthia Martin and Catherine Stover; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar for the consideration of pension cases.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, in the chair.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BREWER, of New York. I ask by unanimous consent to take up from the Calendar the bill (H. R. 7938) granting a pension to Amanda Allen.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest that some order of procedure be adopted.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I ask by unanimous consent that members may be allowed to call up such cases as they may see proper.

The CHAIRMAN. Alternating from one side to the other according to the practice of the last two sessions of the Committee of the Whole House.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

AMANDA ALLEN.

Mr. BREWER, of New York. I call up the bill (H. R. 7938) granting a pension to Amanda Allen.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Amanda Allen, mother of Charles F. Allen, late of Company B, One hundred and forty-fourth Regiment New York Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. BAGLEY) was read, as follows:

The petitioner is the mother of Charles F. Allen, who enlisted August, 1862, as a private in Company B, One hundred and fifty-fourth New York Volunteers, and who died October 5, 1864, at Savannah, Ga., while a prisoner of war. The mother's application for pension was filed October 9, 1879, and rejected on the ground that the soldier at the date of death left a widow surviving, who would have prior right to pension if allowed.

The claimant, in her affidavit, alleges that the soldier was never married nor left a widow or child or children. She also states in another affidavit that her son was married prior to his enlistment, but did not live amicably, and the wife remarried prior to soldier's death; that he lived with his wife scarcely a month, and that she was a woman of bad morals. It is shown also that the wife remarried or lived with another man prior to soldier's death. A witness says that in 1862, while in the service, at Chattanooga, he wrote a will for said Allen, by the terms of which he gave to his mother all his property of every kind, including all claims for back pay and demands of every nature. This affiant says he knew the wife of soldier and when he married her. After their marriage Mrs. Allen acquired a bad reputation, and it was so understood by many people. Allen told this affiant this also, and that he intended to not live with her again, and that he should get a divorce on his return home.

The husband of claimant was, for a long time prior to his death, seriously disabled, so that he could perform little, if any, manual labor.

The petitioner testifies that prior to his enlistment the soldier, her son, was her principal support, and that she was dependent upon him for her maintenance, and that he gave her from time to time while in the said service all he received as bounty or wages while in the service.

The mother is an old woman, and is very poor, and she is represented as being an honest, reputable woman, and has the respect of the community in which she lives.

As the widow of this man seems to have sought the society of another, in the capacity of a wife, and that, too, prior to the death of the soldier, and as the mother was dependent upon the soldier, and by his death lost her support, and is now in need of aid, the committee think it proper she should be pensioned, and recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JUDSON BOSTWICK.

Mr. STEVENS. I call up the bill (H. R. 7334) granting a pension to Judson Bostwick.

The bill was read, as follows:

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I hope the gentleman from New York will make a short explanation of this case.

Mr. STEVENS. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that Mr. Bostwick, the claimant, enlisted September 11, 1861, and was discharged July 2, 1862. On December 18, 1879, he filed a declaration for a pension, which was rejected February 16, 1883, on the ground that there was no record of alleged disability in the War Department. There is abundance of medical evidence of prior soundness and of disability at the time of discharge. He had contracted a severe cold by reason of exposure near Annapolis, Md., which resulted in disease of the kidneys and lungs, a disease that still continues. The examining surgeon finds him one-half disabled, which I suppose will be the measure of the pension that would be granted.

There was no objection, and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

THOMAS D. FITCH.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I call up the bill (H. R. 7696) granting a pension to Thomas D. Fitch.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Thomas D. Fitch, late surgeon of the Forty-second Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I hope the gentleman will make a short explanation.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I will state that Mr. Fitch was a surgeon, in 1862, of the Forty-second Illinois Volunteers, and was mustered on the 12th of January. He had previously been appointed as assistant surgeon in November; had served during November, December, and a portion of January with his regiment in Missouri. He had little knowledge of military matters, and supposed he was regularly appointed, but it turned out that he was not regularly appointed and did not receive a commission as assistant surgeon. He did receive a commission as surgeon, and was mustered, as I have already stated, on the 12th of January, 1862.

He is reported on the rolls of the Department as having been present during the month of November as assistant surgeon, borne on the rolls as a member of the staff, and participated in the duties of an officer—was so regarded and so obeyed. The disability under which he asks this pension was caused by an attack of typhoid fever at the time he was acting assistant surgeon. The technical ruling of the Department is probably correct, that he was not actually in the service at that time. He recovered from that attack and served for two years or more, doing good in the Army as surgeon. The Adjutant-General referred the matter to Congress so that the record might be corrected.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HARRY H. G. KISLINGBURY AND OTHERS.

Mr. MAYBURY. I call up House bill 7618, granting a pension to Harry H. G. Kislingbury, Walter F. Kislingbury, Wheeler S. Kislingbury, and Douglas E. L. Kislingbury, children of the late Frederick F. Kislingbury, a lieutenant in the Eleventh Regiment United States Infantry, reported from the committee with an amendment.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the names of Harry H. G. Kislingbury, Walter Frederick Kislingbury, Wheeler Schofield Kislingbury, and Douglas E. L. Kislingbury, all minor children of the late Lieutenant Frederick F. Kislingbury, Eleventh United States Infantry, and to pay to each of said children a pension at the rate of $25 per month, commencing June 1, 1884, and until said children severally attain the age of 21 years.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take immediate effect.

The amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out in line 9 "twenty-five" and insert "ten;" and strike out the words "commencing June 1, 1884."

Mr. MAYBURY. I need not state the facts of the death of Lieutenant Kislingbury, one of the heroes of the Greely expedition, as it is a matter of history. So far as his orphan children are concerned they are now residents of my State, and the guardian appointed for them by the probate court of the county reports to me that the estate consists only of a few personal effects of their late father and that they are in destitute circumstances. I ask for the reading of the report, which is short.

The report (by Mr. ROBINSON, of New York) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7618) granting a pension to Harry H. G. Kislingbury, Walter F. Kislingbury, Wheeler S. Kislingbury, and Douglas E. L. Kislingbury, children of the late Frederick F. Kislingbury, a lieutenant in the Eleventh Regiment United States Infantry, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report as follows:

Lieutenant Kislingbury, after long suffering, met his death while in service of the United States in the Lady Franklin Bay expedition, leaving four minor children, herein named, as wards of the nation. His services the most hazardous and death the most heroic are matters of history too familiar to need rehearsing.

The committee beg leave to report the following letter from Lieutenant Greely:

"DEAR SIR: I trust that the bill in your charge which provides a pension for Lieutenant Kislingbury's children during minority will be favorably reported. It seems to me that the matter is in a nutshell. Lieutenant Kislingbury met his death after extreme privation and terrible suffering, while in service and on duty with the Lady Franklin Bay expedition, the circumstances attending which are everywhere known. After twenty years' honorable and faithful service, during which he served in all grades, from a private in the volunteer army during the late war to lieutenant in the regular Army, he leaves four children dependent and without support. I know that his last thoughts were of those children, and that he hoped and trusted that the Government would not see them suffer. It seems to me that the Government can expect the most devoted and faithful duty to death from all its servants, but in return they at least hope that through their labor and at the price of their lives reward may come to those they leave dependent.

"Respectfully, yours,

"A. W. GREELY.

"Hon. W. E. ROBINSON, M. C."

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill with an amendment granting each of the children $10 a month instead of $25 a month, as provided by the bill.

Mr. WOLFORD. I move to amend by making it $15.

Mr. MAYBURY. The committee have considered the matter, and I think it had better remain as reported by them. I believe the amount is small.

Mr. CUTCHEON. This continues the pension until 21 years of age. Is that the usual custom?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The general law is until they are sixteen.

Mr. WOLFORD. These are orphan children, with no means of support.

Mr. WOLFORD's amendment was disagreed to.

The amendments of the committee were agreed to; and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DANIEL B. RANDALL.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, I call up from the Calendar the bill (H. R. 7903) granting a pension to Daniel B. Randall, and ask to put it upon its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Daniel B. Randall, late a private in Company A, One hundred and second Illinois Volunteer Infantry.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MORRIS GELD.

Mr. WOLFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4869) for the relief of Morris Geld.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That Morris Geld, late of the general mounted service, United States Army, be, and he hereby is, placed on the pension-roll of the United States, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws, with rate proportioned to his disability, and to take effect from date of discharge, September 30, 1882.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. That bill seems to be rather peculiar in its form. I suppose it was not reported by the committee in that shape.

Mr. WOLFORD. Yes.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I ask that the report be read.

The report (by Mr. WOLFORD) is as follows:

Morris Geld entered Company B, Tenth Regiment New York Volunteer Cavalry, December 19, 1862, and was honorably discharged on July 17, 1865, having made a good soldier. He enlisted in the United States Army October 6, 1865, in the Second Cavalry, for three years, and was honorably discharged October 6, 1868. In his discharge his character is given as "excellent in every respect, sober, and attentive to duties."

Enlisted again the same day in the regiment for five years, and was honorably discharged September 25, 1870, in consequence of General Order No. 92. This discharge says, "Character excellent, and temperate in his habits."

October 13, 1870, he re-enlisted again in the Fourth United States Cavalry for five years, and was honorably discharged October 13, 1875. This discharge says, "Character excellent."

He enlisted as sergeant on October 22, 1875, and was honorably discharged October 21, 1880. This discharge says, "Character very good."

He enlisted again February 11, 1882, for five years, and was discharged September 13, 1882, on a surgeon's certificate of disability. Character still good.

His disability occurred while in the line of his duty in this way: A street-car ran over his hand and mashed the bones of it so badly that his left hand had to be taken off at the wrist-joint. He was on recruiting service at Philadelphia. Being sick one morning, his sergeant sent him out to take a short ride, believing it would do him good; he returned in a very short time, and when within twenty feet of his quarters (the recruiting office) he fell and was run over by the car, with the result as before stated. His sergeant, who was in command, swears he was within twenty feet of him when he fell, and that he was perfectly sober.

The Pension Office rejected his claim because he was out of his quarters with leave for a few minutes.

Your committee report the bill without amendment with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. WOLFORD. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions to move an amendment that this pension shall take effect from and after the passage of the act. I offer that amendment by the instruction of the committee, and while I do this at their instance I think at the same time that this gallant soldier who served his country faithfully, intelligently, and soberly should be entitled to this pension to date back from the date of the injury. I am for the private soldier now a little, and I think that after twenty years of gallant service, intellectual, honorable service to his country, he ought to be entitled to the pension and would have been entitled to it but for some quibble in the Department. There is no question but that he was injured in the line of duty. He was obeying the instructions of his superior officer; and in my judgment there can be no doubt that the man who has been sent out by his superior officer for a specific purpose, and who is injured while absent or on his return to his command, if he is crippled for life, that it entitles him to a pension as much as if he had been shot down in battle.

I say now, sir, that I have offered this amendment by the instruction of the committee, and having done my duty in that respect I oppose the amendment, and hope every gentleman in this House will vote for this gallant private soldier to give him a pension from the time he was disabled in the line of his duty.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. WOLFORD. Certainly.

Mr. WALLACE. Was this application rejected by the Pension Department?

Mr. WOLFORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALLACE. On what ground?

Mr. WOLFORD. There was a misunderstanding of the law, and it was rejected upon the ground that he was not in the line of duty while doing what his superior officer commanded.

Mr. WALLACE. Was there any appeal taken from the decision of the Commissioner of Pensions to the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. WOLFORD. I do not know. He is here before Congress now and asks to be righted, and this Congress has the right to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The Clerk read as follows:

That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I think it would be better to amend the bill in the usual way; that is, that he shall be placed upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

Mr. WOLFORD. That provision is already incorporated in the bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Let the bill be read as proposed to be amended.

The bill as proposed to be modified was again reported.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I move to amend by striking out all after the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

Mr. WOLFORD. I hope that will not be adopted. He has been waiting for his pension a long time, and is disabled and penniless.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the words proposed to be stricken out by the gentleman from Alabama.

The Clerk read as follows:

With rate proportioned to his disability, and to take effect from date of discharge, September 30, 1882.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. If this is adopted, under the law he will be rated according to his disability.

Mr. CUTCHEON. If I heard the reading of this report it gives arrears back to 1862.

Mr. BOUTELLE. No; to 1882.

Mr. WOLFORD. If the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Alabama is adopted, it strikes out the rating proportioned to his disability.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. It is not necessary to incorporate these words. He will be rated subject to the provisions of the pension laws.

Mr. WOLFORD. This man has been entirely helpless ever since his hand was mashed. He served his country faithfully and supported out of his army pay a poor helpless mother. He has been exceedingly temperate and a good soldier, and was left penniless with nothing to support his aged mother. I do insist that Congress in equity has the right to give him pay all that time that he had to depend upon public charity for the support of himself and mother.

Mr. BAGLEY. I wish to say simply that this question involves the payment of arrears. If this bill prevails as originally reported, we break down a rule which has been adopted by the Committee on Invalid Pensions and by the House without exception. I believe that no bill should be passed involving arrears, and I desire to enter my protest against the passage of such a bill now.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that in a case somewhat similar to this recently appealed to the Secretary of the Interior, as I understand, it has been held that the soldier while on leave of absence, while en route to his command to resume his duty, is held to be in the line of duty. I do not know whether that will affect the point made by the gentleman from Kentucky or not. It seems to me that if he was in the line of duty the rating would be fixed by the Pension Office, and also that there would be no necessity for passing a special act here.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CATHERINE SCHOOLS.

Mr. HOUK. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 750) granting a pension to Catherine Schools.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Catharine Schools, widow of Thomas Schools, deceased, late a private in Company C, First Regiment of Delaware Infantry Volunteers.

Mr. HOUK. The report is very short. I ask that it be read.

The report (by Mr. HOUK) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 750) granting a pension to Catherine Schools, submit the following report:

This is a Senate bill, passed by that body, and comes here for the action of the House.

Claimant is the widow of Thomas Schools, who had successfully prosecuted his claim and was a pensioner at the time of his death. His disability was clearly shown. It was contracted in the service in the line of duty, and he was discharged on surgeon's certificate thereof. His disease was consumption, and continued up to his death. The proof shows that he was in that condition from this disease that he was expected to die at any moment.

However, he died when alone, somewhere about his premises, and it seems the Pension Office inferred that the immediate cause of his death was unknown; but all the circumstances, the origin and progress of the disease, his lingering and frail condition, being, as the witnesses state, "at death's door" for some time previous—these facts clearly lead to the conclusion that he died fro m the disability incurred in the service. Such was the view of the Senate, and such this committee believe to be the fact, and therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

Mr. HOUK. I desire to say a word. The Pension Office rejected this claim, but how and why they could possibly arrive at such a conclusion from the testimony on file I can not understand. It was shown that this soldier contracted his disease in the service. The whole case was made out satisfactorily. To use the language of the witnesses in the case, he was "at death's door" for some time previous to his death. But because somebody did not stand by and see him die the Pension Office decided the cause of his death was unknown. The fact is he was a walking corpse until he was found dead.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HARRISON MITCHELL.

Mr. WOOD. I call up the bill (H. R. 1901) for the relief of Harrison Mitchell, of Company K, Forty-eighth Indiana Volunteers, reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions with an amendment.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place the name of Harrison Mitchell, late of Company K, Forty-eighth Indiana Volunteers, on the pension-roll at the rate of $8 per month.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 6, strike out the words "at the rate of $8 per month" and insert "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I should like to have some explanation of this bill.

Mr. WOOD. The report explains the facts. Let it be read.

The Clerk read the report in part.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama (interrupting the reading). I do not care to hear the report read further.

The report (by Mr. MATSON), in full, is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1901) granting a pension to Harrison Mitchell, having duly considered the evidence in the case, report:

That claimant enlisted in the military service of the United States as a private in Company K, Forty-eighth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, August 10, 1862, and was honorably discharged May 29, 1865.

January 6, 1870, he filed a declaration for pension, alleging that "at Medarysville, Ind., February 13, 1864, while returning home on a furlough, in getting off the cars, at said place, in the night-time, he fractured his right leg at the knee," which was rejected June 24, 1878, on the ground that the soldier was not in the line of duty at the time of receiving the disability.

The evidence in the case discloses the fact that claimant was a recruit, assigned to the Forty-eighth Regiment Indiana Volunteers; that the regiment re-entered the service, and returned home on veteran furlough; that at the time of mustering said regiment as a veteran organization claimant had not served a sufficient length of time to enable him to re-enlist as a veteran; but that he came to Indianapolis with his regiment, where he was also given a furlough for thirty days by the officers of his company and regiment along with the balance of the regiment. He received his furlough at Indianapolis February 12, 1864, and started for his home, where he afrived on the morning of February 13, 1864, just before daylight, and in getting off the train fell among railroad cross-ties, breaking his right thigh above the knee.

The incurrence of the injury in manner and at the time claimed is shown by the witnesses present at the time, who aided the soldier in getting to his house after the accident.

The testimony of the commissioned officers of claimant's company show that the soldier did not seek the furlough, but that it was given him solely on the ground that the rest of the company was being granted a veteran furlough, and they could do nothing with the soldier but send him home also.

It is also shown that the soldier was not under the influence of intoxicants in any degree at the time of being disabled.

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

EBENEZER K. MARDEN.

Mr. HAYNES. I call up the bill (S. 1823) granting a pension to Ebenezer K. Marden.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Ebenezer K. Marden, late a private in Company C, Sixth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1823) granting a pension to Ebenezer K. Marden, have examined the same, and report favorably.

The soldier rendered service, contracted the disease, and has ever since been disabled. It is abundantly proved that he was sound and well before enlistment. We see no reason why the bill should not pass, nor, in fact, why it should not have been allowed in the Pension Office.

The cause of rejection in Pension Office June 14, 1882, was because the disability for which a pension was claimed, namely, "chronic inflammation of the bowels," existed prior to enlistment. November 13, 1882, claimant prayed to have his case reopened, which was done, and furnished the affidavits of seven or more reputable persons that he was well and sound prior to enlistment, and that he had no such disability at the time of his enlistment. January 25, 1883, the Pension Office again rejected the claim on the same ground as above stated, notifying the claimant that the "evidence filed by you November 13, 1882, is insufficient to controvert the record, and this office declines to reopen the claim."

Your committee think it is too late, after having accepted the soldier's services in the field, to reject his claim for a pension on the ground that some record or memorandum in the War Department indicates prior unsoundness, especially when, as in the present case, there is a large preponderance of evidence the other way.

We recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. JULIA HARTLEY.

Mr. WOLFORD. I call up the bill (H. R. 7952) granting a pension to Mrs. Julia Hartley.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension law, the name of Mrs. Julia Hartley, widow of Capt. John Hartley, late of the Twenty-second United States Infantry.

The report (by Mr. WOLFORD) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7952) granting a pension to Mrs. Julia Hartley, widow of Capt. John Hartley, beg leave to report:

That the military record of Capt. John Hartley is most honorable. He was in the Army twenty years in continuous service of his country. He enlisted in the Eighth Minnesota Volunteer Infantry in the war of the seceding States on the 14th of August, 1862, as a private; was in several engagements, and was at different times three times severely wounded—twice in his leg and once in his right eye; and for his gallant conduct was made sergeant-major and captain commissary, and brevetted major in the line, and was honorably discharged at the close of the war. He was commissioned captain on the 28th of July, 1866, in the United States Army, and placed in command of Company B, Twenty-second Infantry. He participated in all the Indian fights under General Stanley, and General Stanley writes a letter stating that Captain Hartley served under his command a long time, and in the field a gallant officer, brave and efficient at the station, a good duty officer, meritorious and faithful.

Colonel Otis writes a letter stating that Captain Hartley was a very intelligent, brave, efficient, and faithful officer; quick to understand and prompt to obey any orders; that he served under his command a long time, and very hard and dangerous service in the field, and very useful at the station. General Terry writes a letter that Captain Hartley served in his department, and he was one of the best officers in his command; intelligent, brave, and faithful; an upright gentleman, of superior qualities in every respect. General Hancock writes that he knew Captain Hartley well; that he served under his command; that he was an excellent officer, and gave entire satisfaction. Captain Hartley had a severe wound in his right eye, received in the line of his duty, which always produced pain in his head, and as his arduous duties increased the pain increased until it affected his brain, and caused him in a fit of insanity to resign.

The committee is satisfied that the cause of his unhappy death was the result of wounds received in the service of his country and in the line of his duty. He was kind and generous to his friends and devoted to his wife. His widow is very poor; her late husband left her penniless. Wherefore the committee report back the bill to the House with the opinion that it ought to pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CYNTHIA MARTIN AND CATHARINE STOVER.

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire. I call up the bill (H. R. 2804) for the relief of Cynthia Martin and Catharine Stover.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, directed and authorized to so correct the records of Joseph W. Stover and Robert H. Martin, late of Company H, Fifth Kentucky Cavalry, as to remove the charges of desertion or absence without leave from their commands at the time they were killed, being on or about the 5th day of March, 1862, standing against their names; that the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the names of Cynthia Martin, widow of said Robert H. Martin, and Catharine Stover, widow of said Joseph W. Stover, to be paid pensions from the date of the deaths of their said husbands, to include the amounts provided by law to be paid the minor children of said soldiers; and that said widows and children be paid all bounty, back-pay, and allowances provided by law, any charge of desertion or absence without leave to the contrary notwithstanding.

The bill was reported with the following amendments:

Amend by striking out in line 15 all after the word "date;" all of line 16, and in line 17 the words "of said soldiers," and insert in lieu thereof the words "of the passage of this act." Also, strike out in line 17 the words "and children."

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I would like to hear the bill read as proposed to be amended.

The bill was read as proposed to be amended.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Is that bill reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions?

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire. Yes, sir. I call for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire) was read, as follows:

The evidence in this case establishes the fact that Joseph W. Stover and Robert H. Martin were soldiers in the late war, enlisted in the Army of the United States in Company H, of the Fifth Kentucky Cavalry, commanded by Col. D. R. Haggard; that they left Overton County, Tennessee, which was within the confederate lines, and went to Kentucky for the purpose of enlisting in the United States service; that Cynthia Martin is the widow of Robert H. Martin; that Catharine Stover is the widow of Joseph W. Stover; that in March, 1862, the company returned to Clinton County, Kentucky, which is adjacent to Overton County, Tennessee, and near their home; that while there these soldiers, together with other members of the company from the same neighborhood, returned to their home for the purpose of seeing their families, and the further purpose on the part of one to get a horse belonging to him which he feared would fall into the hands of the confederates. They remained but a short time and started back to their command, before reaching which they were overtaken by Champ Ferguson and his men and killed.

Various witnesses testified to these facts, and it is abundantly shown that they were on their way back to the Army and only a few miles from the place where the company was stationed when so killed. It is shown by one witness that they stated they had authority from their commander to leave. There can be no question as to their returning. Their widows petition Congress for the removal of the charge of desertion and for the granting of a pension, &c., to which they were entitled but for the charge.

Your committee are satisfied that there was no desertion, nor any intention to desert; that they had in good faith gone to see their families, from whom they were not only separated by the ordinary restrictions upon the soldier's life, but they were likely to be deprived of the privilege of seeing them from the further fact that their families lived within the lines of the enemy. The widows are proved to be very destitute and deserving. Your committee are of opinion the prayers should be granted, and therefore recommend that the accompanying bill be passed with amendments as follows:

Strike out in line 15 all after the word "date;" all of line 16, and in line 17 the words "of said soldiers," and insert in lieu thereof the words "of the passage of this act;" also strike out in line 17 the words "and children."

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire. This bill was introduced by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] in this Congress and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. It was unanimously ordered to be reported by our committee at its last meeting. The gentleman from Tennessee informed me to-day that he would probably be unable to be present this evening and desired me to give a word of explanation, if any were deemed necessary.

The bill was introduced into the Forty-seventh Congress and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions and a favorable report was made, and I think the bill or bills passed the House. As I remember the case, our committee thought we would not grant any pension to the children because they must be old enough now to take care of themselves and that we would not grant any arrears. But the bill provides that the widows may have any back pay or bounty that was due the soldiers at the time when they were killed. We thought it proper enough to include that in the bill because the husbands of these two widows were killed under the circumstances mentioned in the report, and the only reason why the Pension Bureau denied pensions to them was on account of the record showing their desertion, when the truth is the men were killed by the Guerrilla Ferguson on their way back to their command. They had no intention of deserting. Their offense, if anything, was merely technical—not substantial.

The facts are, as set forth in the report, that these men went home to see their familes, were absent but a short time, and were returning and had got nearly back to their camp when they were killed. They understood, as I am informed by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], who has examined the matter very carefully—they understood, as I have no doubt, that they had a right to go home and to be absent from their command for a short time, but, being killed, could not return; hence the record of their desertion. It was only a technical desertion at best, not a voluntary desertion in any sense. Therefore, under the circumstances, the effect of the bill being merely to give these poor widows just what the soldiers had earned before they were killed and to put their names upon the pension-roll from and after the passage of the act, the Committee on Invalid Pensions thought would be no more than just.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, this bill is in some respects an extraordinary one, for it contains three propositions, over which, severally, three different committees of this House have jurisdiction. In the first place, the removal of the disability of desertion belongs to the Committee on Military Affairs, not to the Committee on Pensions. Second, the question of the pay that may have been due these soldiers for their service and back pay belongs either to the Committee on War Claims or to the Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay. Thirdly, so far as this bill seeks to put these widows upon the pension-roll, that part of it belongs to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. Therefore I say the bill is an extraordinary one, in the fact that it contains these three distinct propositions, over which three different committees of this House have, severally, jurisdiction.

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire. I only wish to ask if the bill will be satisfactory if amended so as to simply place these two widows upon the pension-roll with nothing more?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I was going on to say that if a bill had been introduced and reported here containing simply the first proposition in this bill, namely, to remove the disability of desertion, there would have been ample jurisdiction in the Department to give all the relief that is necessary; because the very moment the disability of desertion is removed from the records of these soldiers, then, if they were killed in the line of duty, their widows are entitled to pension from the Bureau of Pensions. Not only that, but the administrators of these soldiers would be entitled to whatever pay might have been due them, and could obtain it through the Department without any act of Congress, unless the claim is barred by some statute, and I do not think it is.

Now, I am very much opposed to allowing one committee of this House to usurp the powers of any other committee. It would have been much better that the one necessary proposition in this bill should have gone to the Committee on Military Affairs. If that committee had acted upon it and brought in a bill to remove the disability of desertion, then there would have been no necessity for any further legislation in the matter.

But, Mr. Chairman, the evidence, upon the very statement of the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. RAY], is not clear that these soldiers were not absent without leave. They had left their command without permission to return to their homes. That seems to be admitted, and if they did that it is not a case of mere technical desertion; it is straight-out desertion. It is a case of absence without leave, no matter what the excuse may have been, because every soldier that left the service and went back to his home to see his family had that excuse for his action, and it is a very strong one too—the desire of a poor soldier, away from his home and his children, to return, it may be but for a few days, to see the loved ones he has left behind. But if such a thing is encouraged it will tend to increase insubordination, and if such conduct is to be encouraged by voting pensions to such soldiers or their widows, I fear that it will result in great harm to the service.

Mr. BAGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the clause in that bill in relation to bounty and back pay.

Mr. WOLFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose that motion, and I want to be heard a few minutes in reply to my friend from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT]. I think that my friend (whose heart is always right) misunderstands this whole case. He made one remark in which he surely does not expect this House to agree with him—putting these men on the list of criminals and asserting that it will tend to the violation of good discipline to pension them. Pension whom? Pension the widows of these soldiers, those innocent, harmless women, who lost their husbands in the Army in defense of their country. But again, sir, the rule of law is altogether different from the way my distinguished friend from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] states it in this case.

If these parties were on trial in a court, or even in a court-martial, they would have the benefit of every reasonable doubt. My friend wants to reverse that rule. He says the evidence is not clear in their favor. Sir, the evidence ought to be clear against them before you deprive poor, innocent ladies of what is reasonable and right. Before this House would do that the evidence ought to be clear that these men were in fact deserters. Are you going in this Congress—the highest body upon earth, with more rights and more equities and more great privileges of doing right to the citizen than any other legislative body in the world—are you going to reverse every principle of law and every principle of equity, and declare that you can not pass a law to pension a poor widow without destroying the discipline of your Army?

Does any man in this House believe that if you pass this law giving pensions to these poor ladies any soldier will ever remember that action as a reason or an excuse for deserting his duty? These men were going back to their camp, and that fact alone is evidence of the most convincing character that they were not deserters in a criminal sense. But it is said that they had gone away from their command. Admit that they had gone a few miles farther than they had permission to go, influenced by a longing desire to see the wives and children whom they loved; admit they did that, and there is nothing in it that does not indicate all the good impulses of human nature or all the higher feelings of the great soldiers that carried our flag triumphantly through the war; admit all that, and is it a reason for saying that these good feelings are an evidence of a depraved heart; that the man showing these feelings should bear forever the stain of desertion, should be forever put down as a criminal, and that his wife and children should starve by reason of this stain, because a great Government with plenty of money refuses to overlook these infirmities of human nature? In Heaven's name, will the gentleman from Alabama say that he has no charity for human infirmities? I had no wife during the war [laughter], but I do not know how it would have been possible for me, if I had been within a few miles of my children while that conflict was pending, not to have gone to see them. I do not know how the gentleman from Alabama feels; I do not know how close his wife and children are to him; but I can not believe that during the war, and while he was in the military service, he would not have gone to see them if he had been within a few miles of them.

Why, sir, a chancellor—and this is a higher tribunal than a court of chancery—a chancellor having taken jurisdiction of a case as to one branch of it goes through the whole of it. That is the rule, as my friend from Alabama very well knows. Now why should we not go through this whole case instead of splitting it up and making this Congress a little technical, driveling concern? When the rights of the widows of soldiers of this nation are under consideration why should this Congress say: "We have the case before us; we have heard all the facts; we know you ought to have the relief you ask; but we will divide your case."

My friend from Alabama would say these ladies ought not to have a pension because the stain of desertion has not been removed. Now who takes off the stain of desertion? Do you tell me that this Congress has not the power in the same bill which grants a pension to remove from the record of these soldiers the charge of desertion?

Why should we carve up this case? Why should there be several different tribunals—one to remove the charge of desertion, one to grant a pension, and one to consider the application for back pay? Why should we thus split up this case when it is all before us? We have all the facts here. There is not a gentleman in this House, my friend from Alabama not excepted, who does not believe these poor women ought to have the pay which these United States can well afford to grant them. Everybody, I think, must concede that this stain of desertion ought to be wiped off, and that the pensions asked in these cases should be granted. Everybody, I think, believes this; and I do hope every member here will come right up and do an act of simple justice by voting for this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAGLEY].

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out at the end of the bill these words:
"And that said widows and children be paid all bounty, back pay, and allowances provided by law, any charge of desertion or absence without leave to the contrary notwithstanding."

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire. If I understand the scope of the amendment, its effect is that these widows shall receive a pension from and after the passage of the act.

Mr. BAGLEY. That is the intention. The idea is to strike out all provision for the payment of these arrearages.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York propose to strike out that portion of the bill which removes the charge of desertion?

Mr. BAGLEY. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN (having put the question on the amendment). In the opinion of the Chair the amendment is adopted.

Mr. WOLFORD. I call for a division.

The CHAIRMAN (having again put the question). On this question the ayes are 23, the noes 15. The ayes have it, and the amendment is adopted.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Just one remark, Mr. Chairman, in reply to my sympathetic friend from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] in relation to the law of this matter. Now, it is very true that if you make a charge of desertion against a person the presumption of innocence arises, and the burden is upon the party making the charge to show the fact of desertion. But in this case the record which is kept by authority of law and by sworn officers shows that these two deceased soldiers were deserters. There is record evidence standing——

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire. Will my friend from Alabama allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire. My own impression is that these men were killed within a few miles of their own camp and command, and that the adjutant, or whoever kept the record, entered the charge of desertion against them in ignorance of the fact that they had already been killed. That is my judgment as to the facts of this case. Nobody can tell the precise date when they were killed; I do not know that any one has taken the trouble to cipher that out exactly; but my judgment is that the men would have been back in season, and that there would have been no charge of desertion in this case if they had not been overtaken by Champ Fergusson and both killed.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Admit the statement made by the gentleman from New Hampshire and it does not affect the argument I am making on the question against my friend from Kentucky.

Mr. WEAVER. Let me ask a question.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. WEAVER. The amendment having prevailed to relieve the party of desertion, I ask as a legal proposition whether it is not true should this bill pass that the party could refuse to accept under the bill and receive arrears at the Pension Office?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. If these widows have filed in the Pension Office an application prior to 1880 they would be entitled to their back pay, and they could waive this act and proceed under that.

Mr. WEAVER. And that would be the status of this case if this bill would pass?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Yes; provided we pass this bill now.

The argument I make here is against the legal position taken by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD]. I say where there is a record kept according to law and by officers sworn to perform their duty, the presumption of law is that record is correct. The records of courts can not be assailed at all. They are presumed to be absolutely correct, and can not be questioned collaterally anywhere. A record of this kind may be; the burden of proof is on the party who denies the correctness of that record. It is the duty of those who come here and allege that record was properly kept or that it is false to show that fact by clear evidence.

One other word. I will never consent that there shall be no difference made in this country between soldiers who served faithfully and those who did not. Every man in this country feels, as I do, an interest in keeping up a nice distinction between the faithful and unfaithful soldiers of this country. For one I shall never consent that no distinction should be made between those who stood by their colors during the war and those who deserted them and went home.

Mr. BRUMM rose.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I make the point that this discussion is out of order. The amendment has been adopted and there is nothing before the House to discuss.

The CHAIRMAN. The question before the House is whether the bill as amended shall be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass, and the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BRUMM. I do not wish to discuss the merits of this bill, as I know nothing of them beyond what has transpired in relation to them during the course of this discussion, but I rise for the purpose of saying a word or two on the legal point involved.

I think the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] is mistaken in in his legal proposition in his answer given to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. WEAVER]. It is true, as a matter of law, that where there is a vested right no subsequent legislation can deprive the owner of that vested right. Subsequent legislation which may add an additional right to the vested right may waive the later legislation and take advantage of the former.

In this case there was a vested right to this pension, and no legislation of ours could deprive these widows of that vested right. The law giving pensions grants those pensions to persons who have served their term of enlistment, and it distinctly deprives those who have deserted from receiving any pensions. In this case, therefore, there is no vested right and there is no law they can go back to and take advantage of.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. If a man renders good service and is wounded during that service, but subsequently deserts, I would like the gentleman to show me the law which bars him from a pension.

Mr. BRUMM. One of the first elements, the very gist and marrow of a pension, is an honorable discharge, and no deserter can procure that discharge. The record must show an honorable discharge. In this case these people or their heirs can show no honorable discharge, and hence there is no vested right. The clause in this bill which says that the pension shall date from the date of the passage of this act keeps them down to it, and they can not go back, because there is no right back of this bill. But suppose there was, and I will go a little further as a legal proposition—if there was a vested right prior to the passage of this bill this law says we will remove the charge of desertion, but you can only get your pension from the date of this act; and, therefore, there being no vested right whatever, there being no act in violation of any contract, the latter act, wherever inconsistent with the former, repeals that former act.

Mr. WOLFORD. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. BRUMM. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOLFORD. Does the gentleman suppose that a pension is a vested right in anybody except where there is law?

Mr. BRUMM. It is not a natural right, of course.

Mr. WOLFORD. How is it a vested right? I always thought it was a bounty of the Government.

Mr. BRUMM. It is a vested right under the law.

Mr. WOLFORD. Yes; but this is making the law. We are the law-making power of this Government.

Mr. BRUMM. The law says that certain persons under certain conditions are entitled to pensions, and therefore that right is vested the moment the pension law passes. But the person who is entitled to that vested right must first prove that he comes within the conditions of the law which vests the right. Hence gentlemen need not have any fear when they come to vote upon the passage of this bill that this amendment will enable these people to get their pensions before the date of the passage of this bill. There is no question about that. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I had occasion in the Forty-seventh Congress to investigate the facts connected with this case. It may not, therefore, be inappropriate that I should make a statement concerning it. Prefatory to that statement I will say that no man on this floor is more anxious to keep up the distinction between faithful and unfaithful service on the part of the soldier than I am. I would not vote for a pension for any man who did not serve faithfully.

I concur in what the gentleman from Alabama has said as to the propriety of keeping up that distinction; but it is a distinction that can not hurt in the present case. The facts were these: These parties had left their homes and gone north of their homes for the purpose of enlistment and going into the Federal service.

Mr. SINGLETON. By what authority or what order did they go?

Mr. MCMILLIN. They were citizens when they left, and went of their own volition to enlist in the service of the country. The command in which they enlisted, after it was organized, returned to the neighborhood, that is to say, to the adjacent county in Kentucky in which these parties lived. They went home during the stay of the command there to see their families, and were not away, if I remember correctly, seventy-two hours. As they returned to their command, stating at the time they were absent that they had been permitted to leave their command for the purpose of seeing their families, they were captured and killed, or killed in the process of capture. Those are the facts in the case.

There can be no foundation for a charge of desertion against them.

They were not deserters; they were not absent from their commands for one week, and the evidence all along the line shows that having been absent no longer, if my memory is not incorrect, than a period of seventy-two hours, they were returning to their command when they were killed. They had leave to go, I repeat, as they stated at the time.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman from Tennessee permit me to ask him a question? Had they any authority for their absence from their post?

Mr. McMILLIN. Their statement at the time was that they had; and I will say to the gentleman from Louisiana further, that it is highly probable, when we consider the circumstances, that their statement was a correct one. As I have said, the command was in the neighborhood in which they lived before they enlisted, a fact that was not likely to occur again within three years; for we all know how persons who enlisted in Kentucky and in the border States generally were likely to be separated from their families for the whole war. They had gone away to enlist.

The command in which they had enlisted had returned to that neighborhood, and my colleague from Tennessee, who was on the border during the war, will bear testimony that when that occurred general leave was given to all parties to go and see their families. All soldiers who served during the war from the border States will bear witness to that.

Mr. HOUK. Will my colleague allow me a moment?

Mr. McMILLIN. Certainly.

Mr. HOUK. I presume that every man here on either side who served in the border States in the war knows that it was a custom, by orders from headquarters, to give leaves of absence freely in such cases; that the colonels, captains, and officers of all ranks went home, and that the custom was universal.

Mr. McMILLIN. It is a state of facts that is generally understood to have existed among all soldiers who lived in the border States and served in the Federal Army during the war.

Mr. KING. Is there any testimony to show that these were good soldiers when they were in the service?

Mr. McMILLIN. There is not a charge against their efficiency as soldiers from the hour of their enlistment until the time of their death. There is not a single suspicion that they did not serve faithfully during the whole time. I have read every affidavit in the case and every paper filed with it and studied them closely, for I desired to arrive at a just conclusion in the case; and I came to the conclusion on a thorough examination of the subject that they were fairly entitled to a pension. So thinking and believing, my impression now is that when the question was up before I so stated; but whatever my statement then was, the bill passed the House during the last Congress, but failed in the Senate for want of time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill as amended be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I am not willing that this bill shall pass without first answering the arguments which were made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] on the question of the law of this case.

An invalid pension, or the pension which these widows would be entitled to under the law provided their husbands had not deserted or had not been marked as deserters on the record, is a pension which they can demand as a right, and it is in no sense, as the gentleman from Kentucky said, a bounty.

When the soldiers of the late war, and in fact of all of our wars, volunteered and went out to serve the country, the law says to them, "If you are killed in the line of your duty your widow shall have a pension;" but that pension which goes to the widow is as much her right under the law as the monthly wages of the soldier who performs the service. An invalid pension is in no sense a bounty. But it is a contract which the Government made with the soldiers when they volunteered to serve their country that if they served their country faithfully and were wounded or contracted disease in the service and were honorably discharged they should have a pension; or if they should be killed in the service in the line of duty their widows should have a pension.

Mr. BRUMM. That is not a condition of enlistment.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. It is a condition of enlistment in the case of every soldier.

Mr. BRUMM. I beg your pardon; I think it is not.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The gentleman from Pennsylvania must go and reread the statute. What did your law say to your soldiers when they volunteered? It said to every soldier when he volunteered, "If you shall be killed in the service, your widow shall have a pension." That act was passed before the soldier volunteered. It is a part of the contract which the soldier made with the Government and it is a right the widow can demand, not a bounty that the Government bestows.

Mr. WOLFORD. Will the gentleman from Alabama answer me a question?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOLFORD. There was a law saying that whoever enlisted should receive a bounty and that law was passed before the soldiers did enlist. Was that a bounty or not?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. You may call it what you please, you may call it a bounty if you want to. But if there was such a law and the law promised a man $300 if he enlisted, was not the Government bound to pay it? It was not a bounty at all in the eyes of the law.

Mr. WOLFORD. Every pension is a bounty.

Mr. BRUMM rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that gentlemen must observe the rules. The gentleman from Alabama is on the floor, entitled to be heard, and gentlemen can not interrupt him without addressing the Chair or without his consent.

Mr. WOLFORD. I beg pardon of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the chair is determined this rule shall be observed while he occupies it.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield to me for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRUMM. The gentleman states that the widow of a person killed in the service is entitled to a pension. To entitle his widow or his heirs to a pension is it not necessary that he should be killed in the line of duty?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Of course.

Mr. BRUMM. One more question. If the soldier was killed while playing a game of ball we shall say, if he was killed while in camp accidentally while doing something that was not within his military duties, would his heirs be entitled to a pension?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Not his heirs.

Mr. BRUMM. This party was on his way to his home from the regiment and not in the line of duty. Then, would the mere removal of the charge of desertion, he being killed not in the line of duty, entitle his heirs to a pension by virtue of the killing alone?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question. I will play the Yankee with him and answer his question by asking another. Of course I do not use the word in an offensive sense.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. We are all proud of that name, anyhow.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I ask the gentleman if he believes a soldier who has leave of absence for seventy-two hours and is on his way back to the service—does he not believe that soldier is in the line of duty?

Mr. BRUMM. If he is on his way back to the service under leave of absence, he is.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. In the line of duty?

Mr. BRUMM. Yes, sir; but this is not that case.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. That is all I want the gentleman to answer.

Now, Mr. Chairman, why is it that the widows in these two cases are not entitled to a pension? It is because the record stands there with their husbands marked on it as deserters, and on account of their being marked as deserters they are precluded from getting a pension at the Pension Bureau.

But now what does this bill propose to do? This bill proposes to take those records and to strike from the records those marks of desertion against these parties. Then the record will stand clear of any charge of desertion against these two soldiers whose widows are claiming a pension under this bill.

Now, if you remove from the record this stain upon the character of the husbands, if you blot it out entirely, what is to hinder the widows under the law from going on and prosecuting the claims which they have now in the Pension Bureau, and which were rejected only on the ground that the record showed that the husbands had deserted?

If you remove that stain, if you remove that record, the coast is clear.

Mr. CUTCHEON. They can get arrears then.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. They can get arrears beyond all question. But, Mr. Chairman, all I want to do is to show this House that if you pass a bill removing this stain of desertion which now stands against the record of these parties—and I do not pretend to say you ought not to do it if what the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] has stated is correct—no further legislation is required. All I desire is that the House shall vote upon this matter knowing what they are doing.

Mr. CUTCHEON. May I ask the gentleman one question?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Not just now. I will yield to the gentleman in a few minutes.

Mr. Chairman, there has been a decision upon this subject. Congress—I believe the Forty-fourth Congress—passed a special act granting General Burnett, of New York, a pension of $50 a month. Afterward he became totally blind, his blindness resulting from his service, and he applied to the Pension Bureau, and that bureau granted him a pension of $72 a month, and for a time he drew both pensions.

Mr. BRUMM. The cases are not parallel at all.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. But after the passage of the act which prohibited a man from drawing two pensions the Supreme Court held that he, General Burnett, had the right either to take his pension under the special act of $50 a month or under the general law at $72 a month; that he was at liberty, in his discretion, to take the one or the other, but that he could not take both.

So in this case, if you pass this bill these widows will be at liberty to take pensions either under this law or under the general act, but they can not take under both.

Mr. SINGLETON. Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition to protract this debate, but I shall be called upon presently to vote upon the passage of this bill, and there are several points connected with it about which I am not satisfied. In the first place, I understand that there is no evidence here, no competent evidence I mean, to show that these parties had leave of absence from the Army. All that gentlemen pretend to state on that point is that these men were permitted to leave; but I suppose that no soldier ever left his duty and went home to see his family who did not make the same excuse.

Now, sir, if these men had no privilege granted them of leaving the Army, then, being absent without such privilege, they were deserters. Who will deny that proposition?

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SINGLETON. Yes.

Mr. McMILLIN. These men either were or were not deserters. If they were deserters, upon what theory does the gentleman account for the fact that, according to the testimony of every witness in the case, they were returning to their command within less than a week after they had left it.

Mr. SINGLETON. Mr. Chairman, it does not make any difference whether the time was one day, or one week, or one year; a soldier absent from duty without the permission of his commanding officer is a deserter.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SINGLETON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I simply wish to call attention to the fact that there is a great differenee between "absent without leave" and "desertion." I do not believe there is a case in the whole army record where a man is put down as a deserter who was not absent more than a week unless he deserted to the enemy.

Mr. SINGLETON. Oh, the gentleman is altogether mistaken about that.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. No, sir; I am not.

Mr. SINGLETON. The gentleman is mistaken. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the charge of desertion is made against these parties the presumption is that the officers who made that charge and that record knew more about the facts than we can possibly know. The presumption is that they did not act hastily; and when we now undertake to reverse their action upon partial affidavits—affidavits upon one side—and when the matter has not been properly investigated, I say that we do injustice to the officers who made up that record.

Mr. WOLFORD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SINGLETON. Yes.

Mr. WOLFORD. The charge of desertion was made against these men long after they were dead.

Mr. SINGLETON. What evidence have you of that?

Mr. WOLFORD. That is the statement that is made here.

Mr. SINGLETON. Ah, but I want the law and the testimony now.

Mr. WOLFORD. Well, I will give you the law and the testimony. This charge of desertion was made after they were dead. Now, does the gentleman from Mississippi——

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HATCH). The Chair did not understand the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] to yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] except for a question. Does the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SINGLETON. If the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] wishes to ask me a question, of course I will yield to him.

Mr. WOLFORD. It has been explained that all the men of these different commands had general authority when they were close to their homes to go home. That was not desertion. These men were killed as they came back, and in that way this charge of desertion in their case arose.

Mr. SINGLETON. Now I want to know from the gentleman whether there was not always a record kept by the officers when leave of absence was granted?

Mr. WOLFORD. Never that I know of. [Laughter.] Let me explain. I think I was very intimate with the manner in which things were done. There was always a record made when men were gone any length of time and failed to return. In that case the officer put down the charge of desertion against them; but never till that occurred. So far as I was concerned I always sent my men off when I thought they ought to go. I commanded a division, and was intimate with commanders of divisions in our Army; and I never knew of the charge of desertion having been made where a man went off and staid just a little while.

Mr. SINGLETON. The gentleman from Kentucky is taking for granted what has not been proved here, as I understand. If these men were not deserters, they or their friends had it within their power to have the erroneous record corrected. How should this have been done? Should we be asked to declare by a bill pensioning their widows that these men were not deserters? No, sir, the parties interested should have gone before the Military Committee, where both sides could have been heard, and if the men were not deserters that committee could have reported a bill to correct their record; and then, as remarked by the gentleman from Alabama, there would have been no necessity for applying to this House for a pension.

Why is this case here at all if these men were not deserters? If they were not deserters their widows are entitled to pensions under the law. If they were deserters, the only proper and legitimate way for removing the charge of desertion was not upon mere one-sided affidavits, but through the action of the Military Committee, who could have investigated the whole matter and determined whether these men were in fact deserters.

It is said that they were on their way to their commands. What proof have we of that?

Mr. McMILLIN. We have the testimony of every witness in the case who testifies on that point, and there are a number of them.

Mr. SINGLETON. Well, what do they say about it? I would like to know.

Mr. McMILLIN. They say absolutely that these men were on their return to their commands. That is directly and positively sworn by the witnesses.

Mr. SINGLETON. How far were they from their homes?

Mr. McMILLIN. I do not recollect whether the evidence states that fact.

Mr. SINGLETON. Now, as the men were found somewhere in the neighborhood of the army, and perhaps not far from their homes, it is very easy to assume that they intended to return. But no mortal man can tell what a person intended to do in a case of this sort.

Mr. McMILLIN. For the information of my friend from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] I will say that I am acquainted with the geography of that part of the county where this command was stationed. The command was near Albany, Clinton County, Kentucky, and the homes of these men were only a few miles across the line in the State of Tennessee, not twenty miles distant.

Mr. SINGLETON. How far were they from the army when they were killed and by whom were they killed?

Mr. McMILLIN. As I have just stated, the command to which they belonged was stationed in Clinton County, Kentucky, and their homes were in Tennessee, just across the line, the two points being not twenty miles apart.

Mr. SINGLETON. How far were they from the army when they were killed and how were they killed?

Mr. McMILLIN. They were shot.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. They were killed by the common enemy.

Mr. WOLFORD. By Champ Ferguson.

Mr. SINGLETON. Were they fighting by themselves against the army of the confederacy, or had they joined the Federal Army?

Mr. McMILLIN. They were not marauders; they belonged to a regular command of the Federal soldiery, and, as stated by the gentleman from Kentucky, and as the affidavits show, they were killed by Ferguson's men.

Mr. WOLFORD. And Ferguson was himself a marauder, a very dangerous one.

Mr. SINGLETON. Is that the evidence in the case?

Mr. WOLFORD. Yes; and he was hanged for it afterward.

Mr. McMILLIN. I know nothing of this case except as I gather the facts from the evidence. I do not know a single one of the parties. But I have read every affidavit in the case, and I am acquainted with the region of country in which these matters are said to have occurred.

Mr. SINGLETON. One moment and I am done.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think it proper, as remarked by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT], we should keep up a nice distinction between those who served faithfully during the war on one side or the other and those who did not and neglected their duty—who deserted and were put down as deserters.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] made a most sympathetic speech here in favor of these ladies. I do not think there is any man living who regards women more highly than I do, and I would go as far as he who goes furthest to do them a service. But, sir, these ladies claim these pensions through their husbands—not because they are women, for there are a thousand women in the land doubtless as good—and if we pension them simply because they are women, I could bring scores to take pensions on that ground; but they claim through their husbands, and if their husbands were guilty of desertion I do not think it becomes us in a bill of this sort to pension them.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SYLVESTER GREENOUGH.

Mr. HOLMES. I call up the bill (H. R. 7434) granting a pension to Sylvester Greenough.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Sylvester Greenough, a soldier of the Mexican war, Black Hawk war, and Florida war, and late a private in Company E, Thirty-seventh Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry (Gray-Beard Regiment), at the rate of $12 per month.

The report (by Mr. HOLMES) was read, as follows:

Sylvester Greenough, the claimant, enlisted as a private in Company E, Thirty-seventh Iowa Volunteer Infantry, on September 6, 1862, and was discharged on May 24, 1865. He is an old man of about 75 years of age, and alleges his disability to be "old age, and general debility caused by hardship in the service, and chronic diarrhea, which he contracted in the war of the rebellion, near Alton, Ill., in the line of duty." The record also shows prior service of the claimant in Company K, Fourth United States Infantry, in Florida war, and also in Company H, Fourth United States Infantry, in the Mexican war, making altogether over fourteen years' service for his country. He alleges that hardships in the service have broken him down, and that he is entirely disabled for the performance of any manual labor, which fact is fully sustained by the certificate of the examining surgeons.

The testimony of comrades and neighbors is to the effect that the claimant was stout and hearty for years before entering the service in the war of the rebellion, and fully corroborates the claimant's allegation of sickness from diarrhea in the service at the time and place alleged, and that he has been incapacitated for manual labor since his discharge by reason thereof.

Your committee think that the record of long and honorable service which the claimant has performed for his country, together with his age and broken-down condition, caused without doubt by the hardship he has sustained, and especially the disease which he is proven to have contracted in the service and from which he is still suffering, and the absolute necessity for speedy relief, if it is to be given at all, present a strong case for the favorable consideration of the Government which he has so faithfully served, and therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZABETH W. CREIGHTON.

Mr. WALLACE. I call up the bill (H. R. 5086) for the relief of Elizabeth W. Creighton.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Elizabeth W. Creighton, widow of J. Blakely Creighton, late a rear-admiral, on the pension-roll, and to allow her a pension at the rate of $50 per month from and after the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. BAGLEY) was read, as follows:

That the applicant, Mrs. Elizabeth W. Creighton, is the widow of J. Blakely Creighton, late a rear-admiral in the service of the United States; that she is now receiving a pension of $30 per month, in accordance with law, and she asks that her pension be increased to $50, the sum given by special act, in many cases, to widows of general officers.

As the committee have recommended an increase in other cases of this character, they feel justified in recommending the passage of the accompanying bill. Mrs. Creighton is in straitened circumstances, and has to depend in part upon the charity of friends for support.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HENRY N. HUGGINS.

Mr. PARKER. I call up the bill (H. R. 7735) for the relief of Henry N. Huggins.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Henry N. Huggins, dependent father of Andrew P. Huggins, deceased, late a private in Company K, Twenty-fourth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, on the pension-roll, subject to the conditions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. BAGLEY) was read, as follows:

The petitioner applied for a pension August 11, 1879, alleging that his son died from disease of the lungs, contracted in the service of the United States, and that before and at the time of death he was dependent upon him for support, and that he did at sundry times contribute money for that purpose. Of the son's receiving wounds and incurring disease in the Army there is no doubt, as it was proven to the satisfaction of the Pension Office, he being allowed and paid a pension of $8 per month from May 30, 1863, to the time of his death, July 13, 1877.

It is in evidence that the soldier received a canister-shot through the right thigh at Bull Run, Virginia, August 30, 1862, and that prior to that he had been sick with measles with many others in the regiment, and that, on account of the hospital being overrun with sick, he was obliged to remain in company quarters, and in consequence took cold and had "falling back of the measles," from which he never recovered, but that his lungs became affected; that he had a constant cough, which continued and increased until he died from hemorrhage of the lungs.

This is the substance of several affidavits, both medical and lay, which makes the fact of soldier's death plainly and positively attributable to disease incurred in the service.

Soldier was married, but his wife is dead, and there are no children. Mother is also dead, and the father has a clear title.

As to the question of dependence, the claimant shows that the soldier enlisted at 18 years of age; that after he was old enough to work he received his wages; that soldier sent from the Army $40, and afterward $100 or more; that after his return home gave him $100 more; that after his enlistment gave claimant $300 town bounty; that he purchased clothing for his mother to the amount of $35 or $40, and bought affiant a suit of clothes. Claimant says that during the last five years (statement dated August 25, 1881) his whole earnings, with a little his wife had, has been insufficient for his support.

Dr. Jacobs testifies that at the time of soldier's death claimant had chronic dysentery and hyperæmia of the brain, with irritable condition at base of skull. Occupation was that of clerk in a store, and could do about one-third the labor of an able-bodied man. Doctor says at date of affidavit that claimant is in same disabled condition.

Postmaster at Mannsville, N. Y., says claimant is a man of integrity, and that he considers him poor; that he is now more than 60 years old, and incapable of doing much labor. There is much evidence showing the dependence of the father; that he earns but little and is incapable of earning much.

The committee are of the opinion that the claimant is entitled to be placed upon the pension-roll, and recommend the passage of the bill. Claim was rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that claimant was not dependent upon the soldier or assisted by the soldier at the time his wife died. While this may be true it is a mere technical objection, and does not affect the merits of the case.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

FREDERICK HUTTEN.

Mr. ENGLISH. I call up the bill (H. R. 7170) for the relief of Frederick Hutten.

The bill was read, as follows:

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows:

That Frederick Hutten was drafted in the military service of the United States March 7, 1865, and assigned to Company K, Thirteenth Indiana Volunteers, and honorably discharged on surgeon's certificate of disability July 20, 1865. July 17, 1869, he filed a declaration for pension, alleging rupture of the right side, incurred June 1, 1865, while in line of duty, which was rejected on the ground that the disability existed at the time of entering the service of the United States. Dr. P. N. Payne testifies, January 4, 1880, that he was the family physician of claimant prior to his enlistment into the military service of the United States; that he was then a sound able-bodied man, free from any disease or disability; that he treated claimant during an attack of fever in 1864, from which he recovered, and continued to enjoy good health up to the the time of his enlistment.

The testimony of neighbors and intimate acquaintances of the soldier corroborate the evidence of Dr. Payne as to the good health of claimant at the time of the enlistment.

Adolphus O. Mitchell, of Richmond, Wayne County, Indiana, testifies November 11, 1882, that he was captain of claimant's company in the Army, and that about June 1, 1865, at Raleigh, in the State of North Carolina, the soldier received a rupture of the right side, caused from falling upon the ground while returning from drill at "double-time;" that he knows these facts from duplicate papers in his possession and from seeing him in that condition.

John W. Nicholson, of Dubois County, Indiana, a comrade of the soldier, corroborates the evidence of Captain Mitchell.

It is shown by the records of the Adjutant-General's Office that the soldier was examined at the time of his enlistment by T. B. Harvey, surgeon of the board of enrollment of the sixth district of the State of Indiana.

The continuance of the claimant's disability is shown by the evidence.

Your committee find from the evidence in this case that the claimant was disabled in the military service of the United States and in the line of duty, and that he is entitled to a pension, and therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

JEREMIAH M'CARTY.

Mr. SPOONER. I call up a bill (H. R. 6029) for the relief of Jeremiah McCarty.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Jeremiah McCarty, of Newport, R. I., on the roll of pensioners, and to pay him a pension of $25 per month, commencing with the 1st day of September, 1875.

The report (by Mr. STRUBLE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6029) for the relief of Jeremiah McCarty, respectfully report:

That said Jeremiah McCarty was a civil employé at the torpedo station on Goat Island, Newport Harbor, Rhode Island, and that while so employed he was seriously and permanently injured and disfigured in the manner and under the circumstances hereinafter set forth.

On August 31, 1875, said McCarty was directed by Lieut. George A. Converse, United States Navy, the first assistant inspector and executive officer at said torpedo station, to submerge a torpedo, for experimental purposes, about one hundred feet from the shore. While so engaged, under the direction of Lieutenant Converse, and while holding the torpedo in his hands—Lieutenant Converse remaining on the shore and having charge of the electric wires, by which the torpedo was to be fired—the torpedo was exploded by the extremely careless and premature connecting of the wires with the battery, shattering the boat in which McCarty was, destroying his right eye, disfiguring his face, body, and limbs, and permanently disabling him from the performance of ordinary labor.

As the immediate result of said injuries, said McCarty was confined to his room for some two months, endured great suffering, and was compelled to submit to the entire removal of his right eye by a surgical operation. He then reported to the torpedo station for duty and attempted to resume labor there as formerly, but suffered a relapse, which forced him to again forego all labor, and he has never since been able to perform any except light and irregular labor.

McCarty is a veteran soldier of the late war, and prior to said accident was a vigorous, able-bodied man, capable of earning a good support for himself and his family.

In addition to the permanent injuries above mentioned, said McCarty alleges impairment of the sight of his remaining eye, partial loss of hearing, shortness of breath, pains in the head and body, and general weakness and disability.

The facts, as found by your committee, are corroborated by the medical and other testimony submitted, by the official report of said accident made by Capt. R. K. Breese, United States Navy, then in charge of said torpedo station, to the Bureau of Ordnance of the Navy Department, and by the certificate of said Captain Breese.

Said certificate, affording a concise and officiel account of said accident and of the injuries incurred by said McCarty, is here given in full, namely:

UNITED STATES TORPEDO STATION,
Newport, R. I., November 13, 1875.

I certify that Jeremiah McCarty was employed on the civil roll of the station on the 31st August, and was directed by one of the officers of the station, Lieut. G. A. Converse, to place a torpedo containing about fifteen pounds of powder. Whilst so engaged the torpedo was exploded, through no fault of his, and a very serious injury was the result. At this time the apparent permanent injury is loss of right eye, face disfigured by powder, and legs badly marked by same. Complaint is made at times of inability to work as of old, at which I am not surprised; the great wonder to me being that the man lived after such an accident.

A full report of the accident was made to the bureau on September 8.

K. R. BREESE,
Captain, United States Navy, and Inspector of Ordnance, in charge of station.

In view of the facts and circumstances, your committee recommend that said bill be amended by striking out the word "five," in the sixth line, and all of lines 7 and 8, and by inserting at the end of line 6 the words "from and after the passage of this act;" and that, as so amended, the bill be passed.

The amendments of the committee were read, as follows:

Strike out "25" and insert "20;" and strike out "commencing with the 1st day of September, 1875," and insert "from and after the passage of this act."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JACOB WIENER.

Mr. BAGLEY. I call up a bill (H. R. 7292) to grant a pension to Jacob Wiener.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Jacob Wiener, late a private in Company I, Forty-first Regiment of New York Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. BAGLEY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7292) granting a pension to Jacob Wiener, having considered the same, report as follows:

The petitioner enlisted in the Army of the United States as a private in Company H, Forty-first New York Volunteers, on November 1, 1861, and was discharged November 7, 1864. Declaration for pension was filed November 8, 1878, alleging that at Hunter's Chapel, Va., January, 1862, he froze both feet so that they burst open and disabled him for the performance of duty, and was attacked with rheumatism in both feet and legs while on guard duty. The Pension Office allowed $4 per month for frost-bite, but rejected the claim for rheumatism on the ground that it did not originate in the service and line of duty.

In the consideration of the case it seems somewhat strange that the soldier should remain in the service for two years after the incurrence of the disability, but it is explained by the affidavits of Henry Sweitzer and Ernest Weber, who say that at the time of the injury the claimant was treated in regimental hospital for a severe cold and frosted feet, which resulted in chronic rheumatism; that in the spring of 1863 they saw him in Washington, D. C., where he was on detached duty, being unfit for active duty or service by reason of rheumatism, from which he was then suffering; that they saw him after his discharge and he was still suffering, and they swear this knowledge is from personal observation.

There is no record testimony or medical evidence of treatment, and claimant has not been able to supply the deficiency, but offers the affidavit of the captain of his company, Julius Stommel, who says that he knew of claimant's feet being frozen, and that he received medical treatment in the regimental hospital at Hunter's Chapel, Va., and that he suffered from broken-open feet several times subsequently. The fact of the claimant's feet being frozen is undoubted, as it is testified to by several witnesses, as also that the rheumatism has been continuous and increasing.

Claimant states that the frozen feet and chronic rheumatism are the direct results of his military service, in consequence of which he has been totally incapacitated from performing manual labor; that without the aid of an assistant he can neither dress, eat, nor perform the functions of nature, and that he is to tally and utterly helpless. This statement is corroborated by acquaintances, and particularly by the attending physician, Dr. R. G. Mauss, who testifies that claimant has steadily run down in health and ability to take care of himself; that his feet, hands, and body swell enormously, entirely incapacitating him from feeding and dressing himself for weeks at a time; that the paralysis of his extremities is steadily increasing, and that his case is a most deplorable one, as he is without means of alleviating his sufferings by reason of his extreme poverty. That as he requires assistance in dressing and feeding himself, and is entirely incapacitated for even the slightest manual labor, he certainly should have his pension increased. Thinks his condition is due entirely to his Army service.

Surgeon-General Barnes, in an affidavit filed January 11, 1882, says claimant has been suffering for the past sixteen years, and is unable to take care of himself. Three examining surgeons have rated disability for frozen feet at $4 per month, without reference to rheumatism. One surgeon rates "first disability, $4;" second, "total second grade, $24."

Special Examiner George W. Frost, after taking evidence in the case under date of February 15, 1883, concludes his report to the Commissioner by saying "that for ten years at least claimant has been wholly incapacitated for manual labor, and that for five years has required assistance, and recommends that the claim for increase be admitted."

General W. S. Rosecrans, in a letter to the Commissioner, says: "Do what you can for this old soldier; I know his condition is distressing."

Your committee are of the opinion the pension should be increased, and recommend the passage of the bill, amended as follows: Strike out of line 4 the following words "place on the pension-roll the name" and insert "increase the pension;" and add after the word "volunteer," in line 6, "to $40 per month." Amend title so as to read, "to increase the pension of Jacob Wiener."

The amendments of the committee were read, as follows:

Strike out "place on the pension-roll the name" and insert "increase the pension;" and at the end of the bill insert "to $40 per month."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to increase the pension to Jacob Wiener."

The amendments were agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CAROLINE HIGGERSON.

Mr. CULLEN. I ask consent to call up the bill (H. R. 1856) granting a pension to Caroline Higgerson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Caroline Higgerson, dependent mother of Robert S. Barber, late a private in Company H, Twenty-second Regiment Illinois Volunteers.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. MARTHA C. BREESE.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I ask consent to call up the bill (H. R. 4280) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Martha C. Breese and put it upon its passage.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the pension now granted to Mrs. Martha C. Breese, widow of Kidder Randolph Breese, late a captain in the United States Navy, be, and the same is hereby, increased to $50 per month.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Let the report in that case be read.

The report (by Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama) is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4280) to increase the pension of Mrs. Martha C. Breese, submit the following report:

Mrs. Breese is the widow of Kidder Randolph Breese, late a captain United States Navy, of whom Admiral Porter has well said: "There was no officer during the war who performed more valuable service than he did." And referring to Mrs. Breese's application to Congress for an increase of her pension, Admiral Porter says: "I hope sincerely that she will not be disappointed in this matter, for if ever the widow of an officer deserved to be taken care of by the Government it is the widow of Captain Breese."

Captain Breese served all through the campaign of the Mississippi, through the siege of Vicksburg, and the opening up of the river to the sea, and always with the most distinguished bravery and self-sacrificing conduct. He was fleet captain of Admiral Porter's fleet at the storming of Fort Fisher, and the heroism with which he led the forlorn hope of naval officers and sailors that assaulted the works by land is a bright page in the history of the civil war, and is the common heritage of American citizens. "But," says Admiral Porter, referring to Captain Breese's part in the campaign of the Mississippi, "he no doubt laid the first seeds of disease on those rivers, for he was never well after he left there." Captain Breese died while on sick leave, September 13, 1881, leaving no estate and nothing for his family to live upon.

The widow of this hero is now dependent upon her small pension of $30 a month and the trifling amount of $2 allowed each of her four little children, she having absolutely no other source of income. Can Congress refuse to grant her an increase of $20, all she asks?

The committee believe not. Certainly her case appeals strongly to the Government, and the committee recommend the passage of the bill for her relief.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

BENJAMIN P. LOWELL.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (H. R. 6310) granting a pension to Benjamin P. Lowell; and as the report in this case is somewhat lengthy, after the bill is read I will ask consent to make a brief statement, which I think will be satisfactory.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized to place on the pension-roll, subject to the pension laws, the name of Benjamin P. Lowell, late of Company I, First Regiment Maine Cavalry Volunteers.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I will state briefly that the difficulty at the Pension Office in this case was that the soldier was unable to prove by persons who saw him at the time of receiving the injury what the extent of the injury was; nor was he able to show that he was cared for by the surgeon of the regiment.

The facts are, that he had been detailed for a certain service at that time, and was on a foraging expedition when the injury (hernia) was received, and he was taken in charge by the surgeon of another regiment and was not able to give the evidence of his comrades. That was the only reason the pension was not allowed at the office.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HENRY BIEDERBICK.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 7933) granting a pension to Henry Biederbick.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws, the name of Henry Biederbick, late a hospital steward in the United States Army, and one of the survivors of the late Greely expedition to Lady Franklin Bay, at the rate of — dollars per month.

The committee recommend the following amendment:

Strike out in the eighth and ninth lines the words "at the rate of — dollars per month."

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. Mr. Chairman, the report in connection with this case is of some considerable length, and I will not ask the attention of the committee to read it, but will make a brief statement of what it discloses as to the personal history of the applicant in this case, which I am satisfied will commend him most strongly to the favor of this committee, as well as to the admiration of all men.

His patriotism induced him to enlist as a common soldier in 1879. By reason of his characteristics he was assigned to duty with the Lady Franklin Bay expedition, which sailed in June, 1881. In this service he devoted himself most assiduously to the duties assigned to him, that of hospital steward, and to such an extent that Lieutenant Greely himsely says that he was so faithful and so overtaxed himself in the discharge of his duties that on frequent occasions he had to make specific orders to restrain him. The report shows that by reason of his exposure and arduous duties he has been deprived partially of his eyesight, his mental faculties have been impaired, and one of his arms is entirely useless, the hand being drawn back by rheumatism; also that he is suffering from heart disease, one of the definitions being asthenopia.

Not being a medical man, I have looked into the dictionary to find the meaning of the word, and find that it means feebleness of the functions of the heart and incapacity on the part of that organ to send the blood through the circulation of the system. I believe that if there is a case that ever was presented to the committee which demands a recognition this is the case, and if there is no objection I move that this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the committee will first be voted upon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY E. FILLEBROWN.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I call up the bill (H. R. 7997) to increase the pension of Mary E. Fillebrown.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Mary E. Fillebrown, widow of the late Commodore Thomas Scott Fillebrown, from $30 to $50 per month, said increase to take effect from and after the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. BAGLEY) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7997) to increase the pension of Mary E. Fillebrown, having carefully examined the same, submit the following report:

The applicant is the widow of the late Commodore Thomas Scott Fillebrown, United States Navy, who died at the New York navy-yard on the 27th of September, 1884.

Commodore Fillebrown, at the time of his death, had served the Government faithfully for a long period of years, having entered the Navy October 19, 1841. He served with distinction during the late civil war, and during the time that he was in the Navy he saw about twenty-four years of active sea-service.

During his entire naval career he was noted for his unflinching integrity in the discharge of his duties. He died leaving little or no property, and his wife is without means of support, and is unable to maintain herself, being in delicate health. It has been customary in similar cases to allow special pensions, and the long and efficient services of Commodore Fillebrown, and the necessity of this pension for the support of his widow, make it right and just that the custom should be followed in this case.

We report the following bill and recommend its passage.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SEBERT TONEY.

Mr. WELLER. I call up the bill (H. R. 7447) granting a pension to Sebert Toney.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sebert Toney, late a private in Company B, Thirty-seventh Iowa Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. HOLMES) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7447) granting a pension to Sebert Toney, having considered the same, report as follows:

Sebert Toney, the claimant, enlisted as a private in Company B, Thirty-seventh Iowa Volunteers, and was discharged on May 24, 1865. He filed his application for a pension on November 20, 1880, alleging disability by reason of "chronic diarrhea and disease of the bladder contracted in the line of duty at Gallipolis, Ohio, in March, 1865." The claim was rejected by the Pension Office on the ground of "inability to furnish any medical evidence of condition in service, or any evidence of condition at discharge and thence up to 1869.

The evidence in this case shows positively, by the testimony of the captain of claimant's company, that claimant was suffering, as he alleges, at Gallipolis, Ohio, with diarrhea and disease of the bladder at said time, and that he went on sick furlough for about a month, and that he was still suffering from said disease, to his positive knowledge, at the time of his discharge. The claimant states in an affidavit that he was first taken with the disease at or near Memphis, Tenn., in July, 1864, and that the second attack, which was much more violent, occurred in March, 1865. The testimony of unimpeachable witnesses shows claimant to have been a perfectly sound man when he entered the Army, and the proof is positive and direct of the continuance of said diseases from the time of his discharge to the present, but to an increased extent. The claimant appears by the evidence to be totally incapacitated for the performance of manual labor by reason of incontinence of urine and diarrhea to such an extent as to make life miserable to him. The witnesses in this case are of the highest character, and the claimant bears the highest reputation for morality and integrity.

Your committee have no hesitation; upon the evidence in this case, in reporting the bill back with recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

EMILY AGNEL.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I call up the bill (S. 475) granting arrears of pension to Emily Agnel.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas Emily Agnel, widow of Lieutenant-Colonel and Professor Hyacinthe Robert Agnel, of the United States Army, was placed on the pension-roll on the 16th day of December, 1880, and from which date payment of said pension was made: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to adjudicate the pension claim of Emily Agnel, widow of Hyacinthe Robert Agnel, as if her application had been filed in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions prior to the 1st day of July, 1880, and to pay, or cause to be paid, to the aforesaid Emily Agnel, a pension at the rate prescribed by law from the date of death of the said Hyacinthe Robert Agnel: Provided, That all sums previously paid on account of pension to the said Emily Agnel be deducted.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY F. BLAKE.

Mr. WINANS, of Michigan. I call up the bill (H. R. 7538) granting an increase of pension to Mary F. Blake.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Mary F. Blake, widow of the late Commodore Homer Crane Blake, from $30 to $50 per month, said increase to take effect from and after the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. BAGLEY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7538) granting an increase of pension to Mary F. Blake, having considered the same, report as follows:

The petitioner is the widow of Commodore Homer Crane Blake, and is now receiving a pension of $30 per month. She asks an increase to $50. It has been the rule of this committee to report favorably bills of this character when the applicant will testify that the increase is necessary for her support. In her affidavit she says:

"My present income is wholly inadequate and insufficient, and an increase of my pension as the widow of the late Commodore Blake is absolutely necessary and requisite for my support and maintenance."

The committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CHARLES W. GREEN.

Mr. MATSON. I call up the bill (H. R. 6177) for the relief of Charles W. Green.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charles W. Green, formerly of Company B, Cass County Home Guard, Missouri State Volunteers.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I call for the reading of the report.

The report was read in part. In full it is as follows:

The petitioner enlisted as a private in Company B, Cass County, Missouri, H. G. Cavalry, June 27, 1861, and was discharged January 11, 1862. Declaration for pension was filed November 12, 1878, in which it is alleged that while on a march from Paola, Kans., to West Point, Mo., about November 28, 1861, he took a severe cold while in camp, at night, which settled in his head and affecting his eyes. The claim was rejected on the ground of no record of alleged disability, and claimant has declared his inability to furnish the necessary evidence to connect it with the service.

Claimant, in an affidavit, says he is unable to get the affidavit of his regimental surgeon, for the reason that he can not find out where he lives or whether yet alive or not, and that the best evidence he can get of being treated in the service for his eyes is the affidavit of Lieutenant Rogers. Claimant further says that he was mustered out with his regiment February 28, 1862, and that he was then broken down in health and has not been able to do a steady day's work since, and that prior to enlistment he was a strong, healthy man, never requiring the services of a physician, and never employed one up to that time; that he had no trouble with his eyes until after entering the service.

The Adjutant-General's report states that the muster-rolls of Company B of the regiment show that claimant was discharged for disability.

Surgeon-General makes same report. Lieutenant Rogers, on whose affidavit claimant relies to show incurrence of disability in service, says, that while regiment was stationed at West Point, Bates County, Missouri, during December, 1861, and January, 1862, owing to the destruction of the railroads and freezing up of the river, it was impossible to get supplies, such as clothing, &c., and hence the regiment did service the greater part of the winter without heavy clothing; and a great many of the men had disease fastened on them from taking severe colds; among the number was claimant, who, being exposed to the severe cold weather while on duty, contracted sore eyes, and for a time during the winter was nearly or quite blind, and when the regiment had been mustered out he was still suffering from sore eyes. States that he saw claimant about five or six years after he was mustered out of service, and he was then nearly blind.

Charles and Elizabeth Baker, who have known claimant since 1869, testify that since that time he has not been able to do a day's work on account of poor health and defective sight, and that he is dependent upon the charity of friends for his living and clothing.

Doctors Frank Abbott, Lewis, and Wright, who are on the medical staff of the Buffalo Homeopathic Hospital, testify that claimant is in a weak, debilitated, physical condition, and that the sight of both eyes is seriously impaired; that claimant was treated at the hospital as a free patient.

Elizabeth Baker, in a second affidavit, says that when Green came to her house in 1869 he was so blind he had to be led around, and that he has ever since been broken down in health and helpless. This affidavit is dated May 31, 1881.

Three examining surgeons, in a certificate dated February 5, 1879, say that the disability is equal to loss of both eyes, total first grade, $31.25 per month.

The committee are of the opinion that the claimant incurred his disability in the service, that he is a great sufferer thereby, and that he is entitled to a pension. It is recommended that the bill pass.

Mr. CUTCHEON (interrupting the reading). I do not insist on the further reading of the report; but I would like the indulgence of the Chair for a moment while I make a remark or two. I take the occasion of the reading of this report, because it is another illustration of the many cases we have had before us where the case is in the nature of an appeal from the Pension Office to Congress.

I desire in this connection to say a few words perhaps of a personal nature. I was informed by a gentleman now on the floor, a member of the House, that some remarks I made a few evenings since in regard to examiners in the Pension Office have been given a much broader construction and application than I had any intention of their receiving. The gentleman I refer to informed me some official connected with the Pension Department had taken exception to the remarks I made. I desire to say I had no intention whatever of casting any reflection on the pension examiners as a class.

I believe as a class there are no more faithful, industrious, and laborious men in the public service. Neither did I intend my remark should be applied to any considerable part of them either at this time or at any other time. The rejected cases to which I applied it are not recently rejected cases, but are cases which were rejected under a former administration of the Pension Office, when, I think, a much stricter rule than is now applied governed the office; when a different system prevailed; when cases rejected by the pension examiner did not go to a court of review; when, therefore, the report of the examiner must be made on the cases not rejected, and therefore when a difficult case was reached it was for his interest to lay it aside.

Now, I do not know that that practice has ever prevailed to any considerable extent, but other gentlemen besides myself have remarked that at some time in the Pension Office a much less impartial system prevailed than prevails at present. For the gentleman now at the head of the Pension Office I have the greatest respect, and I believe the soldiers of this country have no better friend anywhere than the present Commissioner of Pensions. And, as I said before, I believe there is no more faithful, honest body of public servants than the pension examiners, taken as a whole.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BAGLEY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar had had under consideration, pursuant to order, sundry bills on the Private Calendar reported by the Committee on Pensions and the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with various recommendations.

DAVID M'KINNEY.

Mr. STRUBLE, from the Committee on Pensions, by unanimous consent reported with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 7573) granting a pension to David McKinney; which was ordered to be printed and placed on the Private Calendar.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STRUBLE. Mr. Speaker, I dislike to make the request at this time, but I feel impelled to ask the House to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calender for the purpose of considering the bill just reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman make the motion that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar?

Mr. STRUBLE. I do.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar (Mr. HATCH in the chair), and resumed the consideration of bills upon the Private Calendar.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 7573) which has just been reported from the Committee on Pensions.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to place on the pension-roll the name of David McKinney, late a private in Capt. Nathan Boone's company, serving under General Dodge in the Black Hawk war, and grant him a pension, subject to the pension laws, from the date of the passage of this act.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BAGLEY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar had had under consideration a bill (H. R. 7573), and had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, February 7, 1885.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CREDENTIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the credentials of William M. Evarts, chosen by the Legislature of New York a Senator from that State for the term commencing March 4, 1885; which were read and ordered to be filed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Wisconsin; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution requesting our Senators and Representatives in Congress to aid in procuring the purchase of the Portage Lake and Lake Superior Ship-Canal and the Portage Lake and River Improvement Company Canal by the General Government.

Whereas the Senate of the United States has passed certain resolutions, dated April 22, A. D. 1884, directing the Secretary of War to procure information as to cost, condition, and value of the Portage Lake and Lake Superior Ship-Canal and the Portage Lake and River Improvement Company Canal, with a view to a purchase of the same by the Government;

Whereas the honorable Secretary of War selected Col. O. M. Poe, of the United States Army, to make an examination under said resolution, and advise as to the desirability of purchasing said canals;

Whereas the Secretary has reported under this resolution, on the date of January 5, A. D. 1885, recommending that the Government should make said purchase and make those two ship-canals free water ways to the commerce of the lakes;

Whereas the tolls collected by these two canal companies are burdensome to the people of a large district who are supplied through these canals, and equally burdensome to the vessel interest and the commerce of the Northwest using them;

Whereas these canals form important channels that should be made free to the great commerce of the North Pacific country, as well as the local country doing business with those growing Lake Superior industries, and lessens the danger of navigation to this great commerce passing through Lake Superior, making at the enterance of the main ship-canal a harbor of refuge that is needed just where the greatest danger to navigation exists on this great lake: Therefore,

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be urged to use their influence to procure such legislation by Congress as will effect the purchase of these canals and make them free water ways to the people of the region supplied by them and the whole commerce of Lake Superior and the Northwest.

Resolved, That the governor be requested to forward one copy to each of our Representatives and Senators in Congress, and one copy to the honorable the Secretary of War.

SAM. S. FIFIELD,
President of the Senate.
HIRAM O. FAIRCHILD,
Speaker of the Assembly.

STATE OF WISCONSIN,
Department of State, ss:

To all to whom these presents shall come:

I, Ernst T. Timme, secretary of state of the State of Wisconsin, do hereby certify that the foregoing has been compared by me with the original in this office, and that the same is a true and correct copy thereof, and of the whole of such original.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my official seal at the capitol, in the city of Madison, this 3d day of February, in the year of our Lord 1885.

[SEAL.]

ERNST G. TIMME,
Secretary of State.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Memorial to Congress relating to Sturgeon Bay and Lake Michigan Ship-Canal

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin respectfully represents:

That the shipping and commercial interests tributary to our great chain of lakes, and more especially the interests in Wisconsin, Michigan, and Illinois, as well as the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers and their tributaries, require the proper maintenance of the Sturgeon Bay and Lake Michigan Ship-Canal; that it seems to us most desirable that the United States Government have full control of all the waters of such large and necessary traffic and commercial importance, and that the interests of the commerce of the lakes and the welfare of the United States demand that said canal be kept free for all navigation; that the said canal, together with the harbor improvements now maintained and projected by the General Government, forms a very necessary harbor of refuge for the commerce of Lake Michigan:

Therefore, your memorialists would respectfully ask that the United States Government take said Sturgeon Bay and Lake Michigan Ship-Canal on the terms already agreed upon between the General Government and the owners of said canal, thereby causing it to be made a free water way.

We request his excellency the governor of the State to transmit a copy of the foregoing memorial to each of our Representatives in Congress, also one copy each to the governors of the States of Illinois and Michigan.

SAM. S. FIFIELD,
President of the Senate.
HIRAM O. FAIRCHILD,
Speaker of the Assembly.

STATE OF WISCONSIN,
Department of State, ss:

To all to whom these presents shall come:

I, Ernst G. Timme, secretary of state of the State of Wisconsin, do hereby certify that the foregoing has been compared by me with the original in this office, and that the same is a true and correct copy thereof, and of the whole of such original.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my official seal, at the capitol, in the city of Madison, this 4th day of February, in the year of our Lord 1885.

[SEAL.]

ERNST G. TIMME,
Secretary of State.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I present eighteen petitions, signed by 1,049 citizens of Allegheny City and other places in Pennsylvania bordering on the Allegheny River, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of that stream. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I present a preamble and resolution of the Board of Trade of the city of Jacksonville, Fla., in the following language:

Whereas the Board of Trade of Jacksonville, Fla., knowing the benefits of the United States Signal Service reports and records to business men, and especially those interested in shipping matters and the culture of fruits and vegetables, and knowing the appropriations made by Congress for the Signal Service during some previous years have not been sufficient for the proper maintenance of that now indispensable service: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That we most earnestly call on the members of Congress from the State of Florida to use their votes and influence for adequate appropriations for the Signal Service, in order that it may be conducted in a manner for the greatest possible benefit to the agricultural, commercial, and public interests.

I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, presented a petition of business men of Oswego, N. Y., praying that the United States may acquire possession of the Portage Lake canals in the State of Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SABIN presented a petition of the Duluth (Minn.) Board of Trade, praying that the Government purchase the Lake Superior Ship-Canal, and the Portage Lake Improvement Canal, in the State of Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2585) for the relief of James Albert Bonsack, of the State of Virginia, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MILLER, of California. The Committee on Foreign Relations instruct me to report back the bill (H. R. 737) for the relief of Juliet Leef, widow, and the heirs of Henry Leef, deceased, owner of the bark Mary Teresa, illegally seized by Alexander H. Tyler, consul of the United States at Bahia, Brazil, and to ask to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims, it having been improperly referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HOAR. That matter was considered by the Committee on Claims during the last Congress. It presents a very important and interesting public question. I do not think the Committee on Claims will have time to consider it during the present session, and it is utterly hopeless to expect it to be considered by the Senate, much less by the two Houses and the President. I, therefore, instead of having the bill referred to the Committee on Claims at this time, suggest that it lie upon the table with the purpose of having it brought forward in the next Congress and referred.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Committee on Foreign Relations being discharged from the further consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none. The Senator from California moves that the bill be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORGAN. Does the Senator from Massachusetts resist the motion?

Mr. HOAR. I made a motion that it lie on the table.

Mr. MORGAN. The claim was reported upon by my former colleague in the Senate, Mr. Pryor, favorably, as I remember.

Mr. HOAR. No; he made a minority report. It is not important enough to take the time of the honorable Senator from Alabama or of the Senate. It is a matter upon which the Committee on Claims were divided. It presents a very important question, a question which will lead to a long debate in the Senate. My suggestion was that as it is so late in the session the bill had better lie on the table, to be brought forward at the beginning of the next Congress and duly referred.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope the Senator will postpone that motion until the arrival of one of the Senators from Maryland, at all events. They take a great interest in the claim.

Mr. HOAR. I will withdraw the motion and let the bill go to the Committee on Claims. It will amount to the same thing, practically.

Mr. MILLER, of California. It is a House bill, and if it should receive the favorable action of the Committee on Claims at this session it may become a law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the reference of the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations was made under the impression that at some former session the matter had been in that committee and there considered. The Chair was probably mistaken. The question now is on referring the bill to the Committee on Claims. That order will be entered, if there be no objection.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. 2621) to authorize the construction of bridges across the Great Kanawha River below the falls, and to prescribe the dimensions of the same; which was read twice by its title.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1441) to authorize the construction of bridges across the Great Kanawha, and to prescribe the dimensions of the same, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. VOORHEES, from the Committee on the Library, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2611) to revive and amend the act of Congress of August 15, 1876, to encourage and promote telegraphic communication between America and Asia, reported it with amendments.

Mr. PENDLETON. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1004) relative to the Chinese indemnity fund, to report it without amendment. I am directed also to say to the Senate that, under the instructions of the committee, I shall take the first convenient opportunity that the Senate may have to ask for its consideration.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1457) to establish a Department of Agriculture, reported it with an amendment.

TESTIMONIALS TO ULYSSES S. GRANT.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Committee on the Library, to which was referred the message of the President of the United States transmitting the offer made by Mrs. Grant to give to the Government in perpetual trust the swords and military and civil testimonials lately belonging to General Grant, have had the same under consideration, and directed me to report a joint resolution accepting the gift. As it is a matter which I presume will receive the assent of every Senator, and ought to be acted upon promptly in order to do it graciously, I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution (S. R. 119) accepting the gift of William H. Vanderbilt and Julia Dent Grant, wife of Ulysses S. Grant, to the United States of certain articles was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the joint resolution be now considered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The joint resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Whereas William H. Vanderbilt and Julia Dent Grant have by deed of trust executed on the 10th day of January, 1885, presented to the United State certain swords, medals, paintings, bronzes, portraits, commissions and addresses, and objects of value and art presented by various governments in the world to General Ulysses S. Grant, as tokens of their high appreciation of his illustrious character as a soldier and a statesman: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the United States accept the said property and articles, more fully described in the schedule attached to said deed of trust, to be held by the United States and preserved and protected in the city of Washington for the use and inspection of the people of the United States. And the thanks of Congress are hereby tendered to the said William H. Vanderbilt and Julia Dent Grant for their generous and valuable gift.

Resolved, That the said property and articles are placed under the custody of the Librarian of Congress; and the Secretary of War is hereby directed to receive the same for safe-keeping and custody in the Department of War until they can be transported by the Librarian of Congress to a suitable building to be provided for the use of the Library of Congress.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

PUBLICATION OF TREATIES.

Mr. MILLER, of California, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 9,500 additional copies of the Treaties and Conventions transmitted to the Senate by the President in his message of January 23, 1885, of which 1,500 copies shall be for the use of the Senate; 3,000 copies for the use of the House; 4,000 copies for the use of the Department of State; and 1,000 copies for distribution, by the Department of the Interior, among public libraries not depositories under existing laws, each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress to designate two libraries to whom copies of the work shall be thus sent. And the Public Printer is also authorized to print and have bound 2,000 additional copies to be sold at actual cost and 10 per cent. added.

CHANGE OF NAME OF A BANK.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2594) to change the name of the Manufacturers' National Bank of New York to the Manufacturers' National Bank of Brooklyn, N. Y., to report it favorably.

Mr. LAPHAM. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PETER RILEY AND JOHN S. WILLIAMS.

Mr. PLUMB. I should like at this time, as a matter of personal convenience, to ask unanimous consent to have two bills, which have been heretofore reported adversely and postponed indefinitely, placed upon the Calendar. The first is the bill (S. 1443) for the relief of Peter Riley, which was reported yesterday adversely from the Committee on Pensions, and the other is the bill (S. 2010) for the relief of John S. Williams, which was reported adversely on Tuesday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the vote of the Senate heretofore taken indefinitely postponing the bill (S. 1443) for the relief of Peter Riley, be reconsidered, and that the bill, with the adverse report of the committee, be placed on the Calendar. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

He also asks unanimous consent that the vote of the Senate heretofore taken indefinitely postponing the bill (S. 2010) for the relief of John S. Williams be reconsidered, and that the bill with the adverse report be placed on the Calendar. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent at this time that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5670) to authorize a retired-list for private and non-commissioned officers of the United States Army who have served for a period of thirty years or upward.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania that the bill named by him be now considered?

Mr. COCKRELL. There are quite a number of House bills upon the Calendar which could be very readily disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the duty of the Chair to say that debate is not in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. Can the motion be amended?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks for unanimous consent, which is all he can do at this time.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania to move to take up House bills on the Calendar not reported adversely, and let them be considered one after the other.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that debate is not in order. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry of the Chair. Is the morning business over?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is not over, and the Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the bill, the title of which he has stated, be now considered. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have a resolution of three lines passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HOAR. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. HOAR. I shall object until the morning business is over.

HOUR OF DAILY MEETING.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. "Concurrent or other resolutions" being in order, the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution offered yesterday by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], which will be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That on and after Monday, February 9, the hour of meeting of the Senate shall be 11 o'clock a. m., unless otherwise ordered, and the morning hour shall expire at 1 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio if he does not think it is a little too early for us to begin our sessions at 11 o'clock. It interferes materially with all the committee work of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. There are but eighteen working days remaining of the session in which to dispose not only of the vast number of appropriation bills, but of other important bills. It is a question for the Senate to determine. I think it is time that we should begin to meet at 11 o'clock. I may state that it is about the usual time in the session for the Senate to meet at 11.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

COUNT OF THE ELECTORAL VOTE.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the President of the Senate be authorized to appoint two Senators to be tellers on the part of the Senate, in accordance with the concurrent resolution adopted by the two Houses, to make a list of the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States as they shall be declared when the two Houses assemble at 12 o'clock on the 11th of February, 1885.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the President of the Senate be authorized to appoint two tellers on the part of the Senate, provided for in the concurrent resolution of the two Houses on the subject of counting the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States. Is there objection to the present consideration of the motion? The Chair hear none. The question is on agreeing to it.

The motion was agreed to.

JAMES W. TEBBS.

Mr. VOORHEES submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate the sum of $1,696 to James W. Tebbs, as the residue of his salary as messenger from May 5, 1879, to November 30, 1883.

A bill (S. 2168) for the relief of the executrix of Ayres P. Merrill.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I now renew my request, and I hope there will be no objection to it, to take up the bill (H. R. 5670) to authorize a retired-list for privates and non-commissioned officers of the United States Army who have served for a period of thirty years or upward.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to make a suggestion in regard to the conduct of business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to be allowed to submit observations upon this request and the subject of pending business. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The suggestion I desire to make is that hereafter during the remainder of this session, when the Senate proceeds to the consideration of business during the morning hour under the eighth rule, it shall take up and consider House bills favorably reported and pension bills.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that be done this morning.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to be heard upon this matter. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania, if the Senate will allow me, if the bill he refers to is a House bill?

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. It is a House bill, reported unanimously from the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator from Pennsylvania being heard upon this question?

Mr. INGALLS. Is the order of morning business concluded?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. INGALLS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania that the bill be now considered?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I shall object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made. "Concurrent or other resolutions" are still in order.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection has just been made to that.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Not to that, I believe.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is what the Chair asked for. "Concurrent or other resolutions" are still in order. [A pause.]

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I am informed by Senators on the floor that the morning business is now over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not yet. Are there further "concurrent or other resolutions?" If there be none that order is closed.

ARMY RETIRED-LIST FOR PRIVATES.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Now is it proper for me to make my request?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I renew my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 1080, being the bill (H. R. 5670) to authorize a retired-list for privates and non-commissioned officers of the United States Army who have served for a period of thirty years and upward. The question is on agreeing to the motion. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I call for a division.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 27, noes 4; no quorum voting.

Mr. HAWLEY. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOAR. I think if the Senate will divide again there will be a quorum, if the Chair will ask unanimous consent for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Chair will put the question again. The Chair hears no objection.

The question being again put, there were on a division—ayes 33, noes 2; no quorum voting.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Before the yeas and nays are taken I wish to say——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to say three or four words.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to be heard. Is there objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator yield a moment?

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the vote be taken viva voce again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to make a statement. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Pennsylvania will proceed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I simply wish to state to the Senate that I shall be compelled to leave the city on Monday, and I am extremely anxious to have this bill taken up and disposed of before I go. If I were to return in a week I should not care about pressing the bill now, but I may be gone longer, and I therefore ask the indulgence of the Senate to consider this bill now, which I think will not occupy more than ten minutes of time.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to occupy half a minute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator from Tennessee being allowed to make a statement? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HARRIS. Under the circumstances stated by the Senator from Pennsylvania, as far as I am concerned, I will cheerfully consent to the consideration of the bill to which he refers, but I desire to give notice here and now that unless the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin is agreed to by the Senate, I will from this time on object to the consideration of every House bill on the Calendar that is not regularly reached, and I will vote against the consideration of every bill on the Calendar until the Calendar of House bills favorably reported can be taken up in their order and disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the question whether this bill shall be taken up for consideration the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The yeas and nays were taken.

Mr. CULLOM. I am requested by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] to state that he is ill and will not be in his seat to-day, and he and my colleague [Mr. LOGAN] are paired.

The result was announced—yeas 44, nays 3; as follows:

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 5670) to authorize a retired-list for privates and non-commissioned officers of the United States Army who have served for a period of thirty years and upward.

It provides when an enlisted man has served as such thirty years in the United States Army or Marine Corps, either as a private or as a non-commissioned officer, or both, he shall, by making application to the President, be placed on the retired-list created by it, with the rank held by him at the date of retirement; and he is thereafter to receive 75 per cent. of the pay and allowances of the rank upon which he was retired.

Mr. BAYARD. Is there any report accompanying that bill?

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. There is a short House report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a report from a committee of the House of Representatives as the Chair is told, which came over with the papers.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. It was adopted by the Senate committee.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Let it be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. LYMAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives, March 4, 1884:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5670) for the retirement of non-commissioned officers and enlisted men, submit the following report:

Something is needed to give greater stability and a better standing to the enlisted man in our military service. If he could feel that he would have a proper provision for his old age he would be more likely to support the monotonous life of the service contentedly.

Were such a provision made, it would go far to make our military service an attractive one for respectable men, and in this way to get rid of the disreputable characters, who take the first opportunity to desert.

It is scarcely necessary to say that desertion is not only a great loss to the Government in men, money, and material, but it is the source of serious demoralization.

The annual desertions from our Army are between three and four thousand, and any measure that would lessen this number might well be considered an economical one; but beyond the question of economy stands that of justice. For it is no more than just that the soldier who has given all the best years of his life to the military service of the country should have some provision made for his old age beside the present Soldiers' Home, where he is separated from his family.

It is the opinion of the Lieutenant-General of the Army that thirty years would be the proper period of service to authorize the retirement of a private soldier or a non-commissioned officer. The passage of this bill would not entail much expense for the Government, because there are in the Army only fifty enlisted men who have served thirty years.

Your committee therefore advise the passage of the accompanying bill as a substitute for bill H. R. 1040.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to have the yeas and nays on the question of the passage of the bill. For one I do not hesitate to say that I am opposed to the creation of so many retired-lists in this country. The people of this country are all alike. I do not see why men engaged in the military service should be put upon retired-lists to be supported, after a certain period by the taxes drawn from the people any more than any other class of worthy citizens. I think we are doing wrong in creating these life pensions by retirement and otherwise that saddle upon the people of this country such a large number of persons who are to be supported by taxes paid by the people. I shall vote against the measure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the passage of the bill the Senator from Delaware demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask my honorable friend from Delaware what he would do with soldiers who had served in the United States Army thirty years.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I would pay them for the services which they rendered at the time, and I would treat them as I would treat any other man engaged in the public service, just as I would treat the Senator from Massachusetts, pay him for his services while in the public service and when he retired from the public service of his own will I would make him do as other men do, provide for himself.

Mr. HOAR. You will discharge the soldier, I suppose, if he was disabled at the end of thirty years?

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, a few years ago we had a bill of like character to the one now before the Senate up for consideration, and after very considerable debate the bill passed the Senate, receiving the approbation, I believe without a call of the yeas and nays, of the entire Senate.

The theory on which the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate made that report is very clear. There is a great spirit of jealousy on the part of the men in the Army that officers drawing high pay are placed on the retired-list after they become worn out in the service, while the soldier who has served equally as honorably and faithfully in his more humble position is left in his old age without protection.

We thought that it was not right; we thought that the same reason applied in the one case as the other, and that bill passed the Senate. It contains some few words—I have not the bill before me, but I drew it myself—requiring that those retired should have served honorably and continuously. The word "honorably" is not in this bill, as I think it ought to be. It was found after investigation that there were quite a number of cases where a man had served his term of enlistment and after being out a few weeks re-enlisted. That class would be cut out under the old bill. For that reason the word "continuously" is left out of the present bill.

If the theory be correct that a military officer who has devoted his whole time to the service of the country should be provided for by the Government, I can see no reason why that should not apply to the private soldier and to the non-commissioned officer precisely as to the commissioned officer. I can see no reason for the difference.

It is a well-known fact—perhaps Senators have had their attention called to it—that desertions have got to be alarmingly common all through the Army. There is loud complaint of the frequency of desertions. Many plans have been presented by officers of the Army to endeavor to prevent these continual desertions in the Army. It is my opinion as a member of the Military Committee, and I think the entire committee agree in that idea, that if we show by act of Congress our determination to take care of these old men after they have honorably and faithfully served their country for that long period of time, it will be a great incentive to men to remain in the service and not desert; and therefore we thought it was not only a good thing in itself to do, because to-day a vast amount of expense is incurred by enlisting men, having them desert, and having to send details for the purpose of arresting and trying them, but that all things considered, as these points were presented on the former bill which was satisfactory to the Senate, this bill should be accepted, being practically the same as the one formerly passed by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FRYE (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON], who is detained from the Senate by sickness in his family; but under the pair I feel at liberty to vote on a question like this.

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS], but feeling at liberty to vote on a question of this kind, I vote "yea."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 37, nays 5; as follows:

FEES IN PENSION CASES.

Mr. JACKSON. I move that the bill (S. 2511) relating to claim agents and attorneys in pension cases, passed yesterday with amendments, be printed as passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee moves that the bill named by him which passed the Senate yesterday be printed as passed.

The motion was agreed to.

PRIVATE PENSION BILLS.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate now to proceed to the consideration of private pension bills not reported adversely, as they stand upon the Calendar, and that the morning hour be extended until these bills shall be completed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of private pension bills on the Calendar reported favorably——

Mr. MITCHELL. Not reported adversely. There are some reported without recommendation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Those not reported adversely, and that the consideration of those bills be continued until they are disposed of. Is there objection?

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania that he continue them until 2 o'clock.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope the Senator from Iowa will let them go through. It will not take long, and there are some Senate bills in the list.

Mr. MITCHELL. We had better go through with them. Some are Senate bills which we want to send to the other House.

Mr ALLISON. Very well; I make no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MITCHELL. I accept the suggestion made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] that the rule of five minutes' debate be applied.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to have that a part of the understanding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania modifies his request so as to be a proposition that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of private pension bills on the Calendar not adversely reported, and that the consideration of these bills be continued until they are disposed of, and that the five-minute limitation of debate as under Rule VIII, apply. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The first pension case on the Calendar will be stated.

ERASTUS W. BABSON.

The first pension case on the Calendar was announced to be the bill (S. 772) granting a pension to Erastus W. Babson.

Mr. BLAIR. That may be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill has once passed the Senate and on motion the vote passing the bill was reconsidered, and the question now is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. BLAIR. It may as well be passed over informally. It is a case in which certain further evidence is really necessary and the man himself is dead. The Senator interested in the bill had hoped that it might be available, but I suppose the result will be its indefinite postponement in the end. Let it be passed over for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks that this bill be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

SIMPSON HARRIS.

The bill (H. R. 433) to increase the pension of Simpson Harris, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to increase the pension of Simpson Harris, a soldier of the war of 1812, and who now holds pension-certificate numbered 3706, to $50 per month.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there a report in that case?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. INGALLS in the chair). The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. COLQUITT on June 10, 1884:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 433) to increase the pension of Simpson Harris, have considered the same, and report:

The facts are set forth in the following report made during the present session by the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the House of Representatives (House Report No. 301):

"That Simpson Harris served in the war of 1812 as a private in Capt. James Graham's company, North Carolina militia, from November 28, 1814, to February 22, 1815; that he was honorably discharged, and was placed on the pension-rolls as a pensioner at the rate of $8 per month under act of February 14, 1871.

"Your committee further report that the petitioner is probably the oldest pensioner on the pension-rolls, being now over 104 years old. It also appears from the affidavit of Dr. Samuel A. Hinton, the claimant's family physician, that for more than five years he has been sorely afflicted; that he has suffered from paralysis since 1866; that he has steadily grown worse, other diseases intervening, until, since 1880, he has been entirely helpless. He has not been able to perform manual labor since 1868, and is poor and needy, and a charge upon the charity of his family and friends. He requires the services of an attendant at all times. In view of these facts your committee are of opinion that said claimant should receive the same pension which he would be entitled to if rated by the Pension Department for his disability, and report the bill back with a recommendation that it pass."

Your committee report back this bill without recommendation.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANNE S. MELLACH.

The bill (S. 1154) to increase the pension of Anne S. Mellach was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that this bill is incorrectly entered on the Calendar as being reported without amendment, the fact being that the report of the committee is adverse. The bill, therefore, will be passed over, and the next will be read.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the Calendar be corrected hereafter.

Mr. BLAIR. Is the report adverse?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. So the Chair is informed.

R. W. DUNCAN.

The bill (H. R. 6282) to place the name of R. W. Duncan on the pension-roll was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of R. W. Duncan (colored), known as Pack Duncan, who was employed as a guide for an expedition under the command of Col. W. F. Cloud, of the Second Kansas Cavalry, and who was wounded and permanently disabled on that expedition, at the same pension as would be allowed a private soldier for like disability.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ZELICA T. DUNLAP.

The bill (H. R. 4041) restoring the name of Zelica T. Dunlap was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll the name of Zelica T. Dunlap, late widow of the late Lieut. Col. James E. Dunlap, of the Twenty-ninth Illinois Infantry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BENJAMIN F. AMOS.

The bill (H. R. 5500) for the relief of Benjamin F. Amos was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Benjamin F. Amos, late of the Seventh Kentucky Cavalry Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SYDNEY L. SKAGGS.

The bill (S. 1268) for the relief of Sydney L. Skaggs was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Sydney L. Skaggs, late scout of the Second Arkansas Infantry.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to hear the report read in that case.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. JACKSON January 6, 1885:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1268) for the relief of Sidney L. Skaggs, having examined the same, make the following report:

That said Skaggs, in 1864 and during the early part of 1865, acted as pilot and guide for the different Federal commanders at the post of Clarksville, Johnson County, Arkansas. That in January, 1865, while out with a scouting expedition, under the command of Lieutenant Pitts, of Company A, Second Arkansas Infantry, the party were attacked by rebels or bushwhackers, and during the fight said Skaggs was wounded in each shoulder. The wound in the right shoulder necessitated amputation of the right arm near the shoulder-joint. This amputation was made by the regimental surgeon, and he was treated in the regular Army hospitals. He filed his application for pension, which was rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that he was not an enlisted man in the military service of the Government, and because the general law made no provision for volunteer scouts and pilots, although regularly employed. Skaggs was between 16 and 17 years of age while serving as scout and when wounded, as aforesaid, in an actual engagement with the enemy. Your committee have, in several instances, recommended relief in cases of this character, where the disability or injury was received by the scout in an actual engagement with the enemy. They think such cases constitute a proper exception and come within the spirit of the law. The committee accordingly report back the bill to the Senate with the recommendation that it be passed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES BEDELL, SR.

The bill (S. 2327) for the relief of James Bedell, sr., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the claim of James Bedell, sr., for a pension, on account of the death of Samuel Umstead, a soldier of Company G, Sixty-seventh Regiment Indiana Infantry Volunteers, shall be heard and determined by the Commissioner of Pensions in all respects as if Umstead had been the son of Bedell, as for the purposes of this pension application he shall be taken to be.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM B. SMITH.

The bill (H. R. 5004) for the relief of William B. Smith was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to increase the pension of William B. Smith, late a private in Company K, Fourteenth Illinois Infantry, who is now drawing a pension at the rate of $50 per month, to $72 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN JOHNSON.

The bill (H. R. 2920) for the relief of John Johnson was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It declares that the act of March 3, 1879, entitled "An act for the relief of certain pensioners" (who have lost a leg at the hip-joint), shall be so construed as to include John Johnson, who had his right arm and a part of the shoulder-blade shot away at the battle of Fredericksburg, Va., December 13, 1862.

Sharp, formerly a member of Company E, One hundred and twentieth Regiment New York State Volunteers, to $40 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

NANCY B. LEACH.

The bill (S. 2204) granting arrears of pension to Nancy B. Leach was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The preamble recites that Nancy B. Leach, mother of Bradford Leach, late of Company I, Twelfth New Hampshire Volunteers, was placed on the pension-roll on the 25th June, 1881, and from which date payment of the pension was made. The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to pay Nancy B. Leach a pension at the rate prescribed by law from the date of the death of Bradford Leach, deducting all sums previously paid on account of pension to her.

Mr. JACKSON. I should like to have the report in that case read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. BLAIR January 16, 1885:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2204) granting arrears of pension to Nancy B. Leach, mother of Bradford Leach, have examined the same and report recommending the passage of the same.

The committee desire to submit the exact point involved in this case. The original application was duly made and executed February 11, 1879. It was actually filed June 25, 1881, and the proof sustaining the claim. It was allowed, and certificate No. 205323 issued to the dependent mother, carrying pension at the rate of $8 per month. The claimant supposed that her application was on file until long after the 1st day of July, 1880, the period of limitation under the arrears-of-pension act. The claimant has no practical remedy unless relieved by special act.

Mr. Hill, the attorney employed, is a reputable citizen, who has held responsible positions of public trust, and an honest attorney at law in good standing in the profession.

The affidavits of Hon. James E. French and of Hon. David H. Hill are herewith submitted, which establish all the remaining facts necessary to be stated.

I, James E. French, of Moultonborough, in the county of Carroll, State of New Hampshire, make oath and say, am well acquainted with Nancy B. Leach, holder of pension certificate No. 205323. I well remember the time she made her application for a pension, because it was at my suggestion that she applied to Hon. David H. Hill, of Sandwich, to assist her, and it was in the winter of 1879; said Hill afterward informed me that said claim was filed, and said claimant was so informed several times prior to July 1, 1880.

I have no interest in said claim for a pension.

JAMES E. FRENCH.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 9th day of December, A. D. 1884, and I hereby certify that I have no interest in the prosecution of this claim.

[SEAL.] W. A. HEARD,
Clerk of Supreme Court.

I, David H. Hill, of Sandwich, in the county of Carroll, and State of New Hampshire, depose and say that I acted as attorney for Nancy B. Leach in matter of pension for her as dependent mother. The declaration was drawn by me and taken to William A. Heard, clerk of supreme court, to be executed, as I now remember it.

I think we returned to my office, and I put the declaration in an envelope and put stamp on for postage. It was understood that it was to go by that mail.

I supposed for a long time that it went that day, and so informed Mrs. Leach. The papers were thus completed, and sealed and stamped at the time of their date. I had no doubt of it until a student in my office called my attention to an envelope thus sealed and stamped, which he said he had found among other papers which he thought he had packed away as papers no longer useful, and asked me if there was not something that had been overlooked. I at once sent them to George N. French, a clerk in Treasury Department, to file at the Pension Office. Within ten days he wrote to me that they were filed, and they were sent to said French just a few days before I was informed that they were filed. I can not be positive how they were first overlooked, but believe that my student, A. B. Fosker, of said Sandwich, took some letters to the mail for me, and Mrs. Leach and myself both supposed he had taken the Leach papers with them, and continued so to think until they were discovered by said Fosker, as above described.

My post-office address is Sandwich Center, Carroll County, and State of New Hampshire, and I have no present interest in the pension claim of Mrs. Leach.

DAVID H. HILL.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 9th day of December, A. D. 1884, and I hereby certify that I have no interest in the prosecution of this claim.

[SEAL.] W. A. HEARD,
Clerk of Supreme Court.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be read again.

The bill was read.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire how far does that go back?

Mr. BLAIR. To the time of the war, I believe. The son died in the war. The pension certificate was allowed some time in 1881. The pension has been paid since the date of the filing of the application, about three years, or four years possibly.

Mr. SLATER. This is going much further than we have gone in pension cases before. It is alleged that, by some oversight by the attorney or parties who were connected with this case, the papers were not transmitted to the Pension Bureau in time to come within the act which would allow arrearages. If we open that door we shall be flooded with just such cases. They ought not to pass.

Mr. JACKSON. As the Senator from Oregon suggests, the facts in this case show that the agent or attorney of the claimant negligently failed to forward the application to the Pension Office so that it would reach here in time to get the benefit of the arrears act; and I doubt the propriety of now granting arrears when there was no fault of the Government. We passed a case some sessions since where the application was placed in the mail for transmission in time, but owing to some accident it never reached its destination. The committee thought that inasmuch as the failure resulted from the action of the Government agent, perhaps it was proper to give the claimant the benefit of the intended application; but in the present case the application was never perfected and never actually mailed, and that through the negligence of the attorney.

Mr. BLAIR. We have, I think, repeatedly gone much further than we should be going by the passage of this bill. We have not often done precisely the same thing, I do not know whether ever precisely the same thing. It may be that the facts in this case differ slightly from those of any other case; but repeatedly where there was no application whatever made, but an instrument executed failing in important statutory particulars and placed on file, we have allowed that to be taken and treated as an application, and we have gone so far as where the application was made and actually placed in the mail, but failed through the fault of the mail, or by accident, misfortune of some kind, to be received and filed in season, to hold the declaration to be good and to cover the arrears.

The principle we have acted upon is that where the applicant seems to have in good faith designed to make and file his application so as to secure the benefit of the act, we have relieved against any innocent fault or misfortune on his part.

In this instance the claimant is an old lady who lost her son upon whom she was dependent, and whose application has been proven to be meritorious, and her claim allowed. It seems that she did everything that she possibly could in season to have received the benefit of the law for the arrears. The application was made in due form, executed before a clerk of a court, her agent being a reputable attorney in active practice as I know and as honest a man as there is in our State or in our country, and who sealed it in its envelope, properly directed it, and placed it with his other mail for transmission. In some way the boy who carried the mail to the office failed to get this particular package. How it happened nobody knows; and everybody supposing, the attorney himself, the claimant herself, supposing that the application was on file, it was not until after the period within which it must actually be filed in order to derive the benefit of the arrears act, that the contrary was ascertained. Immediately the declaration was forwarded, and the case was prosecuted and pursued to a successful issue.

Mr. CONGER. May I ask the Senator whether the allowance of the pension was upon that application?

Mr. BLAIR. The final allowance of the pension was upon precisely that same instrument which had thus been delayed through the misfortune of the applicant.

There can be no stronger case in equity. I do not think any private citizen in the United States would be allowed to live in any local community who would take advantage of a blunder or a misfortune of this kind, and it hardly seems to me that the country would stand well in its own estimation if we should take advantage of a misfortune of this sort against this old lady, who is very poor, and as the report shows is utterly without remedy as against the attorney himself. He is a good man, an honest man, standing well in his profession, but he is not in a situation to make good these arrears if their loss was his fault.

Now, a word in regard to the suggestion that we may be overwhelmed with applications of this sort. Since the arrears act expired, I do not suppose we have passed, in the way of relieving all manner of inaccuracies or errors of this description or any description, twenty acts, and I do not remember more than one or two other applications of any sort that have been pending in the present session, and but very few in the last session of Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's five minutes have expired.

Mr. BLAIR. If we pass this I do not imagine we shall be overwhelmed.

Mr. ALLISON. Do I understand the Senator from New Hampshire to state that the Committee on Pensions have established the rule that in cases where by no fault of the applicant the application has failed to reach the Pension Office within the time prescribed advantage shall not be taken of that fact by the Government?

Mr. BLAIR. In instances that have been passed where the application was informally made and filed seasonably we have allowed that defective application to be treated as a correct one. In other instances where the application was not actually filed, where a good or bad application was not actually filed until after the limitation expired, but where in good faith the party made the effort and the application was transmitted in the mail but not received, we have relieved in such cases.

Mr. ALLISON. That is this case?

Mr. BLAIR. That is this case to this extent: The application was made out in due form; the attorney placed it in an envelope, sealed it, directed it properly, and put it with the rest of his mail, and directed his servant to carry it to the post-office, and that is the last he knows about it.

Mr. ALLISON. That is this case?

Mr. BLAIR. It is this case.

Mr. ALLISON. That is a very just case. I have one just like it. I hope this will pass and be made a precedent so that such cases may be allowed.

Mr. BLAIR. There will not be a great number.

Mr. PLATT. I am going to vote for this bill; but I put it on this ground, that it does not appear to have been the neglect either of the applicant or of the attorney that the application did not reach the Pension Office in time, but was a case of mistake or accident. I do not believe that we can open the door to arrears for all cases where by the neglect of the attorney the application has failed to be received in time. I presume that there are a thousand cases in the State of Connecticut where, if we should adopt the rule that the neglect of the attorney was to be overlooked, there would be petitions to grant arrears in instances where the applicant executed the declaration in time to have it filed in the Pension Office.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I shall support this bill because I think it is altogether just; and wherever the fault lies with the Department or in the course of transmitting a claim of this kind to the Department, I think the arrears should be given. I know of a case myself where the application was transmitted to the Department, but no further information can be obtained in regard to it, the information from the Department being that the claim is not on file. I think all such cases should be embraced.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ISABELLA HIGGINS.

The bill (S. 2549) granting a pension to Isabella Higgins was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Isabella Higgins, late hospital matron of the Eighth Regiment of Iowa Infantry Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MILLIA STAPLES.

The bill (H. R. 1504) for the relief of Millia Staples was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the rolls of the Pension Office the name of Millia Staples, of Morgan County, Tennessee, for and on account of services rendered the United States by Benjamin T. Staples, who was killed while in line of duty as first lieutenant and adjutant of the Eleventh Regiment Tennessee Cavalry Volunteers, on March 22, 1863.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

A. SCHUYLER SUTTON.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to, but that the bill will be passed by the Senate as originally introduced, allowing $2,000 per annum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Committee on Pensions. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us have the yeas and nays on the question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PLATT. I wish the Senator who reported the bill, or some member of the Committee on Pensions, would state to the Senate whether the pension proposed of $2,000 a year is in accordance with any precedent which has been already established.

Mr. CULLOM. There is only one precedent. There is none so far as the military service proper is concerned, but the widow of Admiral Farragut was given by the Congress of the United States a pension of $2,000 a year. I believe, as other members of the committee, I think, believe, that this is a case which stands alone so far as the record of military services is concerned, and that we can afford, as a Government, to place the widow of General Thomas upon a level with the widow of Admiral Farragut.

Everybody, I think, admits that General Thomas was the peer of any other Union general in the service of the country during the late war and from the time he entered the service. I have felt, and feel now, that the Congress of the United States ought to give this expression of the recognition of the services of General Thomas to his widow. She has no children. I understand that she is poor. She is of course, as we may well suppose, becoming somewhat aged. I think the Congress of the United States ought to vote her a pension of $2,000 a year. As General Garfield said in referring to the case, when she made application for a pension, there was but one General Thomas in all the world.

I hope that the amendment will be voted down and that the original bill will be passed.

Mr. PLATT. No one has a higher admiration for the services of General Thomas than I have; but we ought in what we do to act with deliberation and with reference to its future effect. You will not be able to persuade the widows of many of the gallant generals of the Union Army that their husbands were not as distinguished for service, for courage, and for ability as General Thomas. If we give a $2,000 pension to the widow of General Thomas it will be very difficult to refuse it to the widows of very many of the generals of the Army in time to come. In other words, it will establish a precedent; but if the Senate desires to do that, of course I have no objection.

Mr. BLAIR. The Committee on Pensions was not unanimous in recommending the amendment to the bill. The bill, as referred to the committee, it will be observed, proposed to grant a pension to Mrs. Thomas at the rate of $2,000 per annum. There is one precedent, that of the widow of Admiral Farragut. Hitherto Mrs. Thomas has been drawing a pension at the rate of $30 per month. I am right in that statement, I think.

Mr. CULLOM. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Since 1876.

Mr. BLAIR. Since the death of her husband in 1876 she has been drawing a pension at the rate of $30 per month, while the widows of very many other officers, who under the law drew a pension at the same rate, have applied for and obtained an increase by special act. This widow, now an aged woman, without children, solitary and alone in the world, and with certainly as great desert on the part of her husband as could be claimed in any other case whatever, even although our most eminent generals might have been already deceased, has been entirely silent. With a dignity that is commendable she has suffered this neglect on the part of her country, in which others have not so readily acquiesced. I do not mean by this to intimate that any have unduly pressed their claims upon a grateful country.

The Congress of the United States has very rarely denied such applications for special relief, and it seems to me as it has seemed to the Congress, that when the widows of any of our officers who rendered the highest and most distinguished service apply to us, being oftentimes in need and disabled themselves by approaching age, and wish a pension at the rate of $50 per month, only giving them an income for their support in a manner consistent with their positions in life of $600 per year, it would be almost disgraceful to deny the application, and certainly Congress has not done it where the application has been made.

As to the suggestion made by the Senator from Connecticut that if we grant to the widow of General Thomas a pension at the rate provided in the bill, we shall be overrun with applications of equal merit, I beg leave to differ. I think that the unanimous verdict of the American people, without distinction of party or of section, would be that no general officer of the United States rendered higher or more conspicuous or more essential service during the recent war than General Thomas. Certainly I think everybody will vote unanimously that he takes rank with Grant, Sherman, and Sheridan. I believe myself that had he been living when recently there was a vacancy and an opportunity to be appointed to the highest position in our Armies, he would have been selected by the universal acclaim of the American people, and the distinguished officer who now holds that position would have been among the very first to have said that George H. Thomas was the man to be appointed to it.

Under these circumstances I could not agree, and did not agree in the deliberations of the committee, to the amendment recommended by the majority of the committee. I trust that it will be rejected and that the bill may be passed as originally introduced in the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. In considering these various applications to increase very largely the pensions granted to a certain class, I noticed some time ago an article published in a newspaper contrasting the difference of treatment meted out to the widows of officers and the widows of soldiers who carried their muskets on their shoulders—who bore the heat and burden of the day and achieved those victories the honors and the laurels of which others largely wore. I ask that the article which I send to the desk may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the paper to which the Senator from Missouri calls attention will be read.

Mr. McMILLAN. What is the paper which the Senator asks to have read?

Mr. COCKRELL. It is an article contrasting the difference between the treatment of officers and privates. If the Senator does not want the Chief Clerk to read it, I can read it myself.

Mr. McMILLAN. No; I simply wish to know what it is.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is an article contrasting the treatment of the widows of officers and the widows of soldiers.

Mr. McMILLAN. Is it an extract from a newspaper?

Mr. COCKRELL. It is from a newspaper.

Mr. McMILLAN. In what newspaper was it published?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not remember now in what paper. I think it is taken from a paper published here in the city of Washington.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator from Missouri permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask if it is not an article written in order to induce the American Congress to pass the Mexican pension bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. No, sir; it has no relation to that question. It was written before that time.

Mr. BLAIR. A bill which makes a large increase for the benefit of the same class which has aroused the sympathies of the Senator.

Mr. COCKRELL. It was written before the Mexican pension bill was passed by the Senate. I have had it in my drawer for nearly two years, waiting for an opportunity to have it read.

Mr. BLAIR. Undoubtedly the Senator may say that its suggestion aided in passing that bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. It was written long before the Mexican pension bill was passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the paper will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TWO SOLDIERS AND THEIR WIDOWS.

James B. Horseman went into the war for the Union as a colonel, at a salary of $3,500 a year, besides perquisites and allowances. He served as colonel bravely and faithfully for a year and about three months, and then was promoted to brigadier-general, at a salary of $5,500 per year besides perquisites and allowances. In this capacity and at these wages he served bravely and faithfully for another year and a quarter and then was deservedly promoted to major-general, at a salary of $7,500 a year, besides perquisites and allowances; and in this capacity, and at this rate of wages, he continued to serve until after the close of the war.

James B. Footman went into the Union Army, at the outbreak of the rebellion, as a private; and his wages for the first year were $144, plus $100 bounty, plus some clothing, plus some grub, when he could get it; total for first year perhaps $500. In the second year he was promoted to corporal, and his total pay for that year was less than for the first. In the third year he was promoted to sergeant, and still his total pay came to less than $500.

In 1864 he was promoted to first sergeant, and "veteraned;" and so for the last year of his service he received in all some $600, counting greenbacks at their face and rations at—well, at a long ways above what they actually averaged. We do not count any perquisites or allowances in his case, because he did not get any. He served bravely and faithfully during his whole time until the close of the war.

Neither General Horseman nor Sergeant Footman was ever wounded, though each passed through many battles; and neither lost health in the service in such manner as to entitle him to pension under the current interpretation of existing laws. After the war, General Horseman held some offices, was prominent in public affairs, had his name in the papers often, and was considered a leading man generally. Sergeant Footman meanwhile plodded along in the even tenor of his way, an unobtrusive and almost unknown private citizen, insomuch that half of his neighbors in the place to which he removed never knew that he had been in the Army, and those who did know did not care.

A few months ago both General Horseman and Sergeant Footman died, both being poor men and leaving large families. Sergeant Footman's death was announced in a three-line notice in the local papers; his funeral was attended by his neighbors; and that was the last the public ever heard or thought of Footman. But General Horseman's death was telegraphed all over the country, and the daily papers published long accounts of his gallant military services, and a contribution paper for the benefit of his family was started, and a bill was forthwith introduced in Congress to grant a pension of $50 a month to his widow, and Congressmen were urged by leading journals to "pass the bill without a dissenting voice."

And then we reflected that the command to "Render unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's" is not greater than that which follows it: "and unto God the things that are God's."

Let us fully honor the memory of the deceased general; but as to granting a pension of $50 per month to his widow because he was a general before granting $8 a month to Sergeant Footman's widow because he was "only an enlisted man"—or indeed as to granting one comrade's wife six times as much as the other, merely and solely because the one man had been a high officer and drawn large salaries while the other, equally brave and faithful, had received from the Government barely enough to keep him alive while he was in the service and nothing afterward, and died "unhonored and unsung"—we say, let us rather reverse the order of things, and first pension the poor sergeant's widow at as high a rate as justice and reason will allow, and then pension the general's widow at precisely the same rate, and no higher.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois has spoken once upon the bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. The bill as referred to the committee did not meet with the approval of my judgment. I should be very highly gratified to vote a pension of $2,000 a year to Mrs. General Thomas and a large number of other widows of distinguished generals and soldiers who served in the late war; but in view of the situation as respects the relative claims of the representatives of soldiers I can not bring my mind to an agreement to that proposition. I thought that perhaps we might safely go as far as is proposed by the amendment, because in the case of the widow of General Shields a pension of $100 a month was granted. I think there has been no other pension so large as that granted to a soldier or to any representative of a soldier in the Army.

The case of Mrs. Admiral Farragut has been mentioned. She is receiving a pension of $2,000 a year, but it must not be forgotten that Admiral Farragut was at the head of the Navy of this country and it is a case of greater distinction than that of General Thomas. If we grant the pension even as proposed by the majority of the committee to the widow of General Thomas, we must in justice to a large number of others whose husbands also rendered distinguished services to the country increase their pensions very largely. If we are to do it at all, we ought to do it intelligently and purposely, and meet the question here and now.

I am not disposed myself to go so far as that, and especially because up to this time the other branch of Congress has declined to do the simple justice—I might say very much less than justice—to the widows and mothers and fathers of private soldiers who served in the late war that we proposed to do by the so-called Mexican pension bill passed by the Senate at the last session, but which has not thus far been favorably considered in the House of Representatives.

I make this allusion somewhat in response to the statement from a newspaper which has been read in the hearing of the Senate. I am willing to grant a pension of $100 a month to Mrs. Thomas, but I am not willing to go any further.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, there is one distinction made by this bill which has not been mentioned in the debate so far as I have heard it, and that is, that a pension is granted to the widow of General Thomas irrespective of the cause of General Thomas's death. That is the case with most pensions of this kind, which are in effect benefactions as compared with any pensions which we grant under the general law. So far as I know, no pension has ever been granted to the widow of a private soldier unless the widow could prove that the soldier had died from a disease incurred in the line of duty; but we have taken up admirals of the Navy—not admirals like Farragut, but admirals who were admirals in name in comparison with Farragut—and general officers of the Army, and other persons of title and of newspaper and other distinction, and have given to their widows pensions irrespective of the cause of death; thus not only constituting a distinction between the two classes growing out of the amount of the pension and the necessities of the case, but a distinction still broader by reason of the fact that one relates strictly and directly to a disability incurred in the line of duty and the other is totally outside of that.

I have heretofore opposed pensions of this character uniformly; I have said much in the Senate about them, and have been so uniformly overruled that I had made up my mind hereafter to say nothing. If, however, there is a case which could have the assent of my vote, it is that of a pension to the widow of General Thomas. I am not willing to let the remarks of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL] go without challenge, to the effect that the service of Admiral Farragut was one thing and that of General Thomas an entirely different thing; that Admiral Farragut was much more eminent than General Thomas, and consequently his widow constituted a class by herself as compared to the widow of General Thomas. I think there was no more meritorious soldier who wore the blue than General Thomas, no one who was more entitled to the gratitude of the nation than he, and no one who, in my opinion, was more ignored during his lifetime, when the opportunities presented themselves for his promotion, than General Thomas.

But we are dealing with this question either upon a rule or system or plan which we have adopted about the question of pensions, or we are dealing with it simply at haphazard. If we are dealing with it upon a rule, then we ought to apply substantially the same rule to these people that we apply to the great mass of the body of the Army. If we are dealing with it without reference to rule, then we ought to take up not only one case but hundreds and thousands and tens of thousands of cases of the widows of private soldiers who served their country just as intelligently, just as faithfully, just as efficiently, and at just as much cost as that of any man who served it under shoulder-straps.

We not only have considered that the Senate should do but one of these cases, but it seems that we have permitted our regard for rank and for reputation to obscure the real merits that underlie all this pension business. I have in my mind two pension bills which went through the Senate one day, which pensioned the widows of two ex-Presidents—two ladies who I am told are not only beyond the reach of want, but are in affluence. Although they needed nothing we added to their already ample funds, to their great wealth, $5,000 a year for life; yet we reject here day after day the applications of people who, whatever the relation may be between their present disability and their services in the Army as shown by testimony, have that claim upon us which soldierly service always gives or ought to give, especially when it is followed by disease or incapacity on account of that service to labor in order that one may live. We actually give to those who need it not for the purpose of taking it away in the shape of taxes from those who do need it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Mr. President, it was my fortune to introduce this bill, and I did it as much as a tribute to the memory of one of the greatest of American generals as an act of justice to his lonely widow whom he left behind. The world takes note of rank. The question whether the Congress of the United States has dealt liberally and justly by the widows and representatives of private soldiers is not the question here. Nobody expects that the pension granted to the widow of a general who commanded great armies and fought great battles and won great victories will be the same as that granted to the widow of a private soldier. It may be true that the latter may be as much entitled to it as the former, but Congress has never proceeded upon that theory.

It is simply a question here whether the widow of this great general should be treated as the widows of other generals and as the widows of high officers of the Navy have been treated, or whether an exception is to be made against her. I placed the amount in the bill at $2,000, because there is a precedent in the case of Admiral Farragut, and regarding also the other precedents which have been established. Many representatives of deceased officers receive $50 a month, some $100; the widows of former Presidents of the United States receive $5,000 a year, and proceeding upon the theory that Congress would be willing to grant a pension in this case according to the services which were rendered by General Thomas, I could not put the sum at less than $2,000 per annum.

The name of General Thomas is illustrious. No general during our war rendered greater service. There was none more able than he. He was an ideal soldier, modest, brave, and unflinching in the line of duty. He came as near illustrating the perfection of his race as any man who ever lived. All who knew him regarded him as a model soldier and a model man. There is no question that he and his command saved from disaster the Union Army in two great battles. His splendid battle of Nashville, one of the last victories of the war, will be studied as a model by the students of military science as long as war lasts upon the earth.

I do not wish to prolong the discussion, but I hope the Senate will vote down the amendment put upon the bill by the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll-call will proceed on the question of agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Pensions, which proposes to reduce the sum from $2,000 per annum to $100 per month.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FRYE (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON].

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS]. I shall withhold my vote for the present. I do not know how he would vote. I should vote "nay" if the Senator from Louisiana were present.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 17, nays 27; as follows:

Mr. VAN WYCK. I move to amend the bill by adding a new section, as follows:

SEC. 2. That all widows or minor children of soldiers and sailors who, as such, are now receiving, under existing laws, general or special, the sum of $8 per month, by reason of the death of such soldiers and sailors in service or from a disability contracted in the military or naval service of the United States and in line of duty, shall, from and after this date, be entitled to and receive the rate of $12 per month in lieu of said rate of $8; and all such widows or minor children who shall hereafter be found to be entitled to the rate of $8 per month under existing laws, shall be entitled to and receive the rate of $12 in lieu of said rate of $8.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President, that is precisely the same language which the Senate incorporated in the Mexican pension bill, as it is called. The majority of the Senate no doubt felt then as now that if there was any general legislation to be had it should be to increase the meager compensation given to the widows of soldiers who had fallen upon the field of battle. I have felt it my duty to call the attention of the Senate to the matter by way of amendment to this bill. It is proposed to a House bill. If the Senate adopts it and places it upon the bill and the House refuses to concur, then we can readily consent that the Senate shall recede from its amendment so as not to imperil the bill for the relief of the person now seeking this pension. I am anxious, inasmuch as there is no possibility of legislation on this branch of the question unless it be done in this way, that the Senate should at least seek this opportunity to do this act of justice.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska whether his amendment covers the case of dependent parents?

Mr. VAN WYCK. No. There is also another provision which should be put in, and the Senator from Pennsylvania is desirous in regard to it. I should have incorporated that in the amendment except that I feared some Senator might think we were proposing to do too much. If the Senate will adopt my amendment then I would suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania that we take the sense of the Senate upon an amendment giving to dependent parents an increase of pension.

Mr. BLAIR. Of course it is a very difficult thing for a friend of the soldiery of the country, disabled or suffering from their services, to oppose an amendment of this kind; but the Senator from Nebraska must on reflection see that attaching the amendment to the bill in the first place imperils somewhat the passage of this poor woman's application; and also that inevitably it is the defeat of the Mexican pension bill itself.

If this bill should be amended and returned to the House of Representatives and the amendment there concurred in, the man must be less astute than I think the Senator from Nebraska is, especially when he brings his faculties to bear upon a subject, who does not perceive that the other bill with its numerous and exceedingly important provisions for the relief of others who have suffered on account of service to their country will be entirely passed by. I had hoped that the fight might be fairly and clearly in the other branch of Congress upon the passage of that bill giving general and almost universal relief to all those who have deserved well of their country from the Mexican war to the present time. We know very well that there is no inclination to pass that bill in some quarters, and that there may be an inclination, if some slight excuse can be availed of, to defeat the bill and fall back upon a comparatively unimportant provision enacted into law.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska has once spoken.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I failed in all the suggestions of the Senator from New Hampshire to see——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has already spoken once on the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Can I be recognized and yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No, sir.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Is another amendment in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An amendment to the amendment will be in order, or the Senator may proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I propose to amend the amendment by making the amount $13 instead of $12 per month.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chief Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 7 of the amendment it is proposed to strike out "12" and insert "13," so as to read "$13 per month."

Mr. VAN WYCK. I failed to see any force in the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire that we should place the Mexican pension bill in peril by agreeing to the amendment I propose. It is in peril to-day, and it is defeated substantially. The only question is whether we should attempt to do something which I think both branches of the American Congress desire and which the nation universally desires, to increase the pensions of those whose pensions are far below what they should be in the estimation of the nation. The Mexican pension bill stands defeated, and as far as the veteran of the Mexican war is concerned the bill is defeated by the action of the Senate. The Senate were so unwilling that that measure should stand upon its own merits that they placed amendments upon it which they believed to be just and right. The only practical question which we are to meet to-day in regard to pensions is whether we shall do this act of stern justice, or refuse to do it and do nothing in the direction which my friend, the Senator from New Hampshire, desires.

Neither the Mexican soldier nor the other classes who were considered in the amendments of that bill will receive any consideration at the hands of this Congress before the 4th day of March. We can now save something for the most needy of all these classes, and that is the widows who are receiving only $8 a month, and I suggest to my friend that it puts nothing in peril, not even this bill. If we place this amendment on the bill and the House refuse to concur, then I shall be willing that the Senate recede from our amendment. We shall have done all in our power; we shall have satisfied the nation that we are disposed to do justice to those who are receiving least from its bounty and generosity. We can come in here specially and give the widows of some admirals and generals $50 a month, and of others $2,000 a year. That imperils nothing; but when we resolve to take out of the difficulty in which they are placed that class which, of all others, is entitled to relief, we are told we should pause a moment to give the subject consideration; and when a remedy is within our reach, as it is now, to save them and do them justice, it will be no answer, and my friend from New Hampshire can not answer the widows in New Hampshire, and New England, and the United States, who are receiving this pittance, by saying that it is sought to do something else, and he fears this would put something else in peril. If he sees fit to embrace the opportunity I trust he will do it now and here.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask unanimous consent, as I have spoken once on this amendment, to be permitted to speak again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; the Senator is in order in speaking five minutes on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. The distinction between "twelve" and "thirteen" is, of course, entirely unimportant. The Senator assumed that the Mexican pension bill was dead when he made his motion. Sir, that was a violent assumption, and, as I believe, an untrue assumption, however honest he may have been in making it. The Mexican pension bill now is dead, and dead by virtue of the offering of this amendment, in which I shall now concur.

Mr. MORRILL. I shall vote against this amendment, because it is not germane to the bill. It is general legislation upon a private bill, and any one who is acquainted with the proceedings of the two Houses will see at once that it is a measure that will be lost if sent to the other House in this form, not acted upon, and this poor woman, if she is entitled to a pension, will lose it, at any rate for the present session.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to ask the Chair a parliamentary question. Suppose we attach this amendment to the bill and the House fails to take action upon it at all, could the Senate recede without having possession of the bill before it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would think, on casual reflection, that the Senate could not.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is the difficulty I have.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Let me suggest that it would be competent for the Senate then to recall the bill from the House and strike off its own amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose that course could be pursued. I should vote for this amendment with great pleasure, if that could be done. I think the request ought to be granted, and if the Senator will see to it that this lady is not affected injuriously by this amendment I shall vote for it, but I shall hold him responsible for the recall of the bill in time to secure its passage.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I will say that I intended to put this amendment on the last bill on the Calendar, but the chairman of the committee suggested that was for the case of an exceedingly old lady, and then I had better take the first opportunity, and so I offered it on this bill. I will with pleasure accept the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio, and see to it that if the amended bill is not acted on the bill shall be recalled and the amendment receded from.

Mr. HOAR. It may be better to put it on some bill that the Senator knows will be acted on.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I think there will be no difficulty in accomplishing what we desire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska insist on his amendment to the amendment?

Mr. VAN WYCK. I withdraw that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment is withdrawn. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask for a division on the question of concurring in the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CALL. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the bill:

SEC. —. That all widows or minor children of soldiers and sailors who as such are now receiving, under existing laws, general or special, the sum of $8 per month, by reason of the death of such soldiers and sailors in service or from a disability contracted in the military or naval service of the United States and in line of duty, shall, from and after this date, be entitled to and receive the rate of $12 per month in lieu of said rate of $8; and all such widows or minor children who shall hereafter be found to be entitled to the rate of $8 per month under existing laws shall be entitled to and receive the rate of $12 in lieu of said rate of $8.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we had better have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS]. If he were here, I should vote "yea" on this amendment.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. FRYE. I am paired with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON].

The result was announced—yeas 37, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—37.

Aldrich,	Dolph,	Lapham,	Sabin,
Allison,	Garland,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Blair,	Hale,	Mahone,	Sherman,

Cullom,	Jackson,	Platt,
Dawes,	Jones of Nevada,	Plumb,

NAYS—12.

Bayard,	Cockrell,	Harris,	Riddleberger,
Beck,	Coke,	Maxey,	Saulsbury,
Chace,	Fair,	Morgan,	Vest.

ABSENT—27.

Brown,	George,	Kenna,	Pugh,

Farley,	Jonas,	Pendleton,	Williams.
Frye,	Jones of Florida,	Pike,

So the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. MITCHELL. I offer an amendment which I send to the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the bill the following:

SEC. —. That in considering the claims of dependent parents the fact and cause of death and the fact that the soldier left no widow or minor children having been shown as required by law, it shall be necessary only to show by competent and sufficient evidence that such dependent parent is without other present means of comfortable support than his or her own manual labor, or the contributions of others not legally bound for his or her support; and such as may be found to be entitled to $8 a month under existing laws shall receive in lieu thereof $12 a month from the date of this act.

SEC. —. That in all applications under the general pension laws, including this act, where it appears by record evidence that the applicant was regularly enlisted and mustered into the service, that fact shall be prima facie evidence of soundness at the time of his enlistment; but such presumption shall be subject to rebuttal by record or other competent evidence.

SEC. —. That no person shall be entitled to more than one pension at the same time under any or all laws of the United States, whether such pension shall have been already obtained or shall be hereafter obtained, unless the act under which such pension is claimed shall specially so declare.

Mr. MITCHELL. The amendment proposed applies the same rule to dependent parents which the amendment already adopted applies to widows. I think the reasons in the one case are as strong as in the other. It also adopts the rule in relation to presumption of soundness at the time of muster into service, and retains the last section of the so-called Mexican pension bill which was intended to prevent the payment of double pensions. There seems to be some doubt in the law as it now exists on that point. It simply covers those three things.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. MITCHELL called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. SLATER. I trust that amendment will not be attached to the bill. It will endanger the more important and more necessary amendment we have just adopted. It is this method by which we find ourselves losing measures on which the two Houses can not agree. This amendment, I am satisfied, will prevent all legislation on this subject. Let us at one time offer legislation for the widows and at another time for the others.

The yeas and nays were taken.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I wish to state that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] is paired for this afternoon with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE].

Mr. SHERMAN. I have been requested to announce the pair of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS].

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—31.

Allison,	Dolph,	Mahone,	Plumb,

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. I move, as an additional amendment to this bill, the section I send to the desk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. —. That every person who served in the military or naval service for the period of three months during the war of the rebellion, and has an honorable discharge therefrom, and who is or who shall become disabled from any cause not the result of his own gross carelessness, disreputable conduct, or vicious habits, and shall also be dependent upon his own labor for support, shall, upon making due proof of the facts, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the proper authority, be placed upon the list of pensioners of the United States, and be entitled to receive a pension during the continuance of such disability at a rate proportionate to the degree thereof; and such pension shall commence at the date of filing an application therefor. The highest rate of pension granted under this section, which shall be for total incapacity to perform any manual labor, shall be $24, which is hereby made divisible upon that basis for any less degree of disability: Provided, That no person entitled to or receiving an invalid pension under existing laws, or such as may be hereafter enacted, granting pensions for disabilities contracted in the military or naval service of the United States, and in line of duty, greater than that provided for herein, shall receive the benefits of this act; but any applicant for such invalid pension having an application therefor pending, or who shall hereafter file his application for such pension, may, by a declaration over his own signature, at any time, elect to prosecute his said claim under this act or under the general laws, and his pension, when allowed, if prosecuted under this act, shall commence from the date of such election.

Mr. BLAIR. This section is also taken from the Mexican pension bill. The three sections which were last adopted as an amendment to this bill and the section adopted on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska comprise classes embraced also in the Mexican pension bill, whose right to assistance from the Government arises from the service rendered during the war of the rebellion. This section which I now move as an amendment is the principal section of the Mexican pension bill, applying to the soldiers of the late war. It has passed the ordeal of discussion in the Senate; it has been adopted by the Senate, and if these other clauses which have been taken out of the Mexican bill are to be added to this bill, in all justice this section also should be adopted as an amendment to it.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I wish to ask the Senator from New Hampshire whether to pass the amendments which have been proposed to this bill will not amount to about this, that it pensions all those who are provided for in the Mexican pension bill except those who served in the war with Mexico. That is the way it looks to me.

Mr. BLAIR. That is very likely so; but if this private bill which we are passing is to be made to carry as it already does three or four classes which are provided for in the Mexican pension bill, there is no justice whatever in leaving out the by far larger and certainly as meritorious class—that is to say, the soldiers themselves—provided for by that bill, who served in the late war.

Mr. MITCHELL. I presented the amendment which the Senate has adopted because I regard the questions it involved as practically undisputed. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire is one which I understand has led to the difficulty experienced in the two Houses on the subject, and I am inclined to think that its adoption would defeat this bill. I have great hopes that the amendments already adopted may become a law and this bill be passed as it now stands. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire if adopted will raise almost precisely the same question that is now in dispute in the other House. I shall myself vote against it.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire has once spoken.

Mr. BLAIR. I was proposing to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania a question before he takes his seat. I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if the class provided by this section is not made up exclusively of the soldiers of the late war of the rebellion, and if in his belief it is not as just and as necessary that they should be provided for as the other class to which he has alluded.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes. Mr. President, the amendment covers precisely what the Senator from New Hampshire suggests; but it ingrafts upon the statutes of the country a new principle in pension legislation, one about which there has been great difference of opinion and much dispute; and on that account I think it would be likely to lead to the defeat of the bill.

Mr. BLAIR. One question more. Let me ask the chairman of the committee if his own amendment adding the class that has just been added by the Senate, dependent parents or those who are disabled from any cause whatever provided they were parents, does not introduce the same new principle which, in the section I move as an amendment, we undertake to apply to all soldiers?

Mr. MITCHELL. No; it does not at all. It simply increases the rate of pension allowed dependent parents and changes the time in reference to the proof of dependence, and on that I have learned that there is no difference of opinion even in the other House.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not understand this matter as the chairman states it.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Only a word, Mr. President. I concur with the statement made by the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Pennsylvania. The idea which impelled me, as him, was that these matters which were really undisputed might have an opportunity to receive the concurrence of both branches and therefore become law. The disabled soldier of the war to-day receives a pension. The new principle to which I accord my judgment, as well as the Senator from New Hampshire, is that every soldier who served a certain length of time during the war should be pensioned. I say to my friend as substantially the Senator from Pennsylvania has said, that the danger is that that will imperil here the establishment of that which we all desire for a class placed on the Mexican pension bill by the Senate, soldiers who can not receive relief under the present law. That class of soldiers, I say to my friend, I believe in New Hampshire and throughout the Union ask to have their claim deferred until the next session of Congress, when there will be time to consider it, rather than that the claim of the widows and dependent parents should be put in peril or altogether rejected.

Mr. BLAIR. Time will tell about those things.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was rejected.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BLAIR. I suggest that the title be amended to read:

A bill for the relief of Sarah B. Jackson, and for other purposes.

Mr. HAWLEY. Can that title not be amended so as to give some sort of indication of what is in the bill? It gives no indication whatever. It contains very important legislation just now.

Mr. SHERMAN. Add "and to increase certain classes of pensions."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will receive any proposition to amend the title that may be submitted.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move to amend by adding to the title the words suggested by the Senator from Ohio:

And to increase pensions in certain cases.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the title will stand as about to be reported by the Chief Clerk.

The CHIEF CLERK. The title as proposed to be amended will read:

A bill for the relief of Sarah B. Jackson, and to increase pensions in certain cases.

Mr. MITCHELL. And add to that "and for other purposes." There is another purpose in it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania propose an addition to the title?

Mr. MITCHELL. I would suggest a different amendment than that which has been suggested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The title will stand as last reported by the Chief Clerk, unless some proposition to amend is made. It will again be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. "A bill for the relief of Sarah B. Jackson, and to increase pensions in certain cases.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move to strike out the word "and" in the title, and add at the end the words "and for other purposes."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The title will be reported in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The CHIEF CLERK. "A bill for the relief of Sarah B. Jackson, to increase pensions in certain cases, and for other purposes."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? If not, the title will stand as last reported.

WILLIAM HARBESON.

The bill (H. R. 4248) granting a pension to William Harbeson was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of William Harbeson, of Reading, Pa., late a private in Company G, Sixth Pennsylvania Cavalry.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALBERT D. SIMMONS.

The bill (H. R. 7295) granting a pension to Albert D. Simmons was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to put the name of Albert D. Simmons, late a private in Company E, One hundred and ninetieth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, on the pension-roll.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANN J. WILLIAMS.

The bill (H. R. 6934) granting a pension to Ann J. Williams was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Ann J. Williams, mother of Ebenezer Williams, late a private in Company A, First Regiment of Nevada Volunteer Infantry.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PENSION BILLS.

Mr. PLUMB. If the pension bills have been disposed of, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8039) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the Government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator pardon the Chair one moment? The Chair would state that two pension bills were temporarily passed over on the calling of the Calendar, in which reports of the minority had been made, but which were not adversely reported. The Chair awaits the pleasure of the Senate to ascertain whether those bills shall now be considered or whether they shall go over.

Mr. JACKSON. I suggest that they go over.

Mr. MITCHELL. They were within the order, not being reported adversely, but objections were made by the minority.

Mr. COCKRELL. The reports have not come in yet, and the bills can not now be discussed intelligently. I suggest therefore that they go over.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], who is interested specially in these cases and who reported them, I believe, is willing they should go over for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The two bills will go over.

Mr. MITCHELL. Retaining their places on the Calendar?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Retaining their places on the Calendar.

Mr. CULLOM. The reports are not in, I believe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That being the order, the pension cases are concluded.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, presented the credentials of WILKINSON CALL, chosen by the Legislature of Florida a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1885; which were read, and ordered to be filed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MAHONE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, submitted a report to accompany the bill (S. 2617) to authorize the acquisition of certain parcels of real estate embraced in square No. 406, of the city of Washington, for the enlargement of the Post-Office Department building, and to provide accommodations for the city post-office, reported by him from that committee on the 5th instant.

INTERNATIONAL LONGITUDE CONFERENCE.

Mr. MILLER, of California, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported the following concurrent resolution, and submitted a report thereon:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be authorized and requested to communicate to the governments of all nations in diplomatic relations with the United States the resolutions adopted by the international conference held at Washington, in October, 1884, for the purpose of fixing a prime meridian and a universal day, and to invite their accession to the same.

Mr. SHERMAN. That ought to be a joint resolution.

Mr. MILLER, of California. No; a concurrent resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. There ought to be a title to it certainly.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Very well; I can have a title prefixed. I ask that it be printed, and I give notice that I shall call it up on Monday.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PROTECTION OF CHILDREN.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I beg leave to make a report from the second conference committee of the two Houses on the bill for the protection of children in the District of Columbia. The bill has been returned from the House to-day. There is a correction of a clerical error made by this report.

The report was received and read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to bill of the Senate No. 729, for the protection of children in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

1. In line 20, page 1, of the bill, that the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with the addition of the words "or sight," so that the clause will read "in their presence or sight;" and the House agree to the same.

2. In line 27, page 2, of the bill, that in lieu of the word "twenty-one," as amended by the House to read "sixteen," both Houses agree to the substitution of the word "eighteen."

H. H. RIDDLEBERGER,
AUSTIN F. PIKE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

WM. L. WILSON,
J. THOS. SPRIGGS,
E. JEFFORDS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

DISTRICT APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PLUMB. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8039) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the bill be read for amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be taken if there be no objection.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was in the item of appropriation "for salaries and contingent expenses," after the word "dollars," in line 24, to strike out the following words:

And the accounting officers of the Treasury are authorized and directed to adjust and settle equitably the accounts of the late commissioners, allowing such of the same as are manifestly just and proper.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

And the accounting officers of the Treasury are authorized and directed to credit the accounts of the ex-commissioners of the District of Columbia accruing since 1876 with all such disbursements and expenditures, made in good faith, heretofore disallowed in the settlement of the same, wherein it shall satisfactorily appear that the money was paid for goods sold and delivered, work and labor done, materials furnished, or services rendered to the District in accordance with contracts and agreements made in good faith on behalf of the District, and also to adjust and settle equitably said accounts, allowing such of the same as are manifestly just and proper.

Mr. PLUMB. In line 31 of the amendment reported by the committee, after the word "seventy," I move to strike out the word "six" and insert "eight;" so as to read "accruing since 1878" in place of "1876."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARLAND in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. PLUMB. The clause inserted by the House is relative to the adjustment of the accounts of the citizen commissioners whose terms have expired, Messrs. Morgan and Dent, and of the engineer commissioner, Major Twining, who some two years ago died. The Comptroller of the Treasury suspended items of account against them amounting to about $20,000, covering various expenditures for municipal purposes which they had made and which he decided were not within the purview of the acts making the appropriations.

They had allowed expenses of a certain character on the supposition that they had the ordinary municipal authority or discretion over the control of funds committed to them for expenditure. I will name a few of the principal items. One of them is $2,500 paid for interest on what is called the Linthicum loan—a loan of money due by the District. One thousand dollars was paid as the expenses of the National Firemen's Convention, held in the city of Washington. Certain sums were also paid as expenses to the chief of the fire department for examining into the fire-department systems of other cities. They used the contingent fund given to them to employ clerks to do certain necessary work about the District offices. The commissioners expended all of this money, but the Comptroller held that they had no authority to employ money in this way, inasmuch as all the clerks the law intended they should have had been specifically provided for; and so as to other items.

Among other items there was an item for subsistence furnished to the Reform School. In contracting for the supplies of the Washington Asylum the commissioners found that it was better to contract for a large quantity than for a small quantity, and they made a contract in behalf of the Washington Asylum for a large quantity of supplies which they proposed to transfer and did in fact transfer to the Reform School. The Comptroller held that they could not be paid for out of the appropriations for the Reform School, notwithstanding the supplies had gone there, because they had gone under a contract made for the Washington Asylum.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] and myself have for the last year during the time we have been associated together as members of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, having charge of this matter, examined thoroughly these accounts and the cause of their suspension, and arrived last year at the conclusion that the suspension ought to be removed, that the suspension was technical, that the District had had value received for all the expenditures, and that there was nothing in them to subject any of the commissioners to any charge of impropriety or lack of reasonable and proper vigilance. The clause as it came from the House, according to the view of the Comptroller, is not sufficient to accomplish the purpose had in view, and therefore the committee has reported a substitute for it.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator explain why it is that he now proposes to change the date from 1876 to 1878?

Mr. PLUMB. Simply to cover the terms of the commissioners whom we have in view. The date 1876 was fixed by mistake. Eighteen hundred and seventy-eight covers the term of Messrs. Dent and Morgan, the civilian commissioners, and Mr. Twining, engineer commissioner.

Mr. MORGAN. Are there any previous commissioners whose case is the same?

Mr. PLUMB. Not that the committee is aware of. They have not been brought to our attention.

Mr. MORGAN. It seems to me to be a case of legislation on an appropriation bill.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to amend the amendment in line 38 by striking out the words "such of the same as are manifestly just and proper" and inserting "all payments made for expenses incurred in good faith for the benefit of the District." That is the suggestion of the Comptroller of the Treasury as to the form of language necessary to accomplish the object.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the appropriations "for engineer's office," in line 129, after the word "animals," to insert "care of same;" and after the word "items," in line 130, to insert "and services, in all not to exceed;" so as to read:

Contingent expenses, including rent of property-yards, books, stationery, binding and preservation of records in the engineer's and surveyor's offices, printing, transportation (vehicles, animals, care of same, saddlery, forage and repairs), and other necessary items and services, in all not to exceed $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 131, after the word "for," to strike out "contingent" and insert "necessary;" so as to read:

For necessary expenses of office of inspector of gas and meters, for maintaining and keeping in good order and repair the laboratory and apparatus, $800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "That," in line 135, to strike out "hereafter;" so as to read:

Provided, That overseers or inspectors temporarily required in connection with sewer, street, or road work, or the construction or repair of buildings, done under contracts authorized by appropriations, shall be paid out of the sums appropriated for the work, and for the time actually engaged thereon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "annual," in line 142, to strike out "reports" and insert "report;" so as to read:

And the commissioners of the District, in their annual report to Congress, shall report the number of such overseers and inspectors, and their work, and the sums paid to each, and out of what appropriation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 146, after the words "shall be," to strike out "public records" and insert "a part of the public property of the District of Columbia;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided further, That the records of the surveyor of the District of Columbia shall be a part of the public property of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for "improvements and repairs, and for care and repair of bridges," after the word "dollars," in line 172, to insert:

Provided, That all moneys legally retained from contractors shall be invested and held by the Treasurer of the United States, and any sum which has been or shall be realized from such investments in excess of the amounts due to contractors shall be deposited in the Treasury, to the credit of the United States and of the District of Columbia in equal parts.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to amend that by inserting in line 173, after the word "moneys," the words "shall have been or may hereafter be."

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

Mr. SHERMAN. The amendment just now read, it seems to me, is a very unjust provision to contractors, and an unjust discrimination against small contractors. Has that been acted on?

Mr. PLUMB. It has been acted on.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call attention to it. It begins in line 172 and runs to line 178.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator wish it acted on again?

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have it reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the vote by which the amendment was adopted will be regarded as reconsidered. The Chair hears no objection, and the question is on the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to know the object of this proviso. It seems to me to be a very unjust provision to contractors.

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator is willing I will state the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will hear the Senator, subject to the point of order, but I do not want to raise it if I can avoid it.

Mr. PLUMB. In that portion of the organic law of the District of Columbia which provides for the letting of contracts for the laying of pavements, &c., it is provided:

And that the contractors shall keep new pavements or other new works in repair for a term of five years from the date of the completion of their contracts; and 10 per cent. of the cost of all new works shall be retained as an additional security and a guarantee fund to keep the same in repair for said term, which said per cent. shall be invested in registered bonds of the United States or of the District of Columbia, and the interest thereon paid to said contractors.

This difficulty has arisen in a case in which four or five years ago a purchase of bonds was made out of the 10 per cent. retained from a paving contract and the contractors had meanwhile kept up the repairs. A question arose as to whether the contractors or the Government were entitled to the profit which had been realized by reason of the investment in bonds, the bonds in the mean time having appreciated in value. The Treasury Department held that the Government was entitled to the profit, but suggested a suit to determine the question. Thereupon a suit was brought. The statement I make now is that made to the committee by the commissioners of the District of Columbia. Suit was brought, and three of the judges of the supreme court of the District of Columbia said on the hearing that they had no doubt the Government was entitled to the profit and not the contractors, because in the event that the bonds had declined the contractors would have been fairly entitled to have received the money value of the 10 per cent. retained, and could not have been required to take the bonds which had a less value than the reserved 10 per cent. But before the decision was formally rendered the contractors dismissed the suit and brought the matter again before the Treasury Department, where, after going through all the forms and before all the officers before whom it could be brought, including the Secretary of the Treasury, a similar decision was reached. Thereupon the Treasurer, who was then the custodian of the bonds, paid to the contractors the 10 per cent. which had been retained and covered the balance into the Treasury to the credit of the United States. At the same time the Treasurer made the discovery, or claimed to have made the discovery, that the law did not require him to remain as the custodian of these bonds, and he therefore compelled the commissioners themselves to take the bonds, which they did, and rented a box in the safe-deposit company, where they are now kept.

The matter was brought to the attention of the committee with the request on the part of the commissioners that a provision should be inserted which would require the Treasurer himself to keep these bonds, as being a safer and more proper depositary than the board of commissioners of the District, and for the purpose of providing that hereafter one-half the profit, whatever it may be, of this retained fund should go to the District of Columbia and one-half to the United States. It was for the purpose of providing that the Treasurer himself should be the custodian of these bonds instead of having them in the custody of the commissioners, as it is now, that the amendment was inserted.

Mr. SHERMAN. The statement of the Senator is precisely what I am informed is the true status of this matter. It seems to me it is a clear violation of the rights of these contractors and a palpable infringement and change of existing contracts. The present law under which these contracts were made requires the investments to be made and interest to be paid to the contractors. That is a stipulation in the law. Ten per cent. on a contract, especially if it is a large contract, say one amounting to $50,000, would require a deposit of $5,000. That is the money of the contractor earned apparently in the execution of his contract. By the terms of that contract this money is to be invested in Government securities for his benefit. It is his money. The amendment proposes to take that money, the accretions of the bonds, the interest of the bonds, and divide it between the District of Columbia and the United States. It does not belong to the United States.

Mr. PLUMB. The court so decided.

Mr. SHERMAN. But there has been no final decision. The suit was withdrawn for the purpose of trying to make an arrangement. I do not know anything about it except what I have heard. I understand that a suit was commenced upon the terms of the contract for the recovery of the interest; but as there was a hope of settling it in the Treasury Department, the matter being still under consideration there, the suit was withdrawn. These contractors have now a right to sue for the money in the Court of Claims, or in any court of competent jurisdiction. I suppose they could sue for the money; it is their money under the express terms of the contract.

I think that rather than deal with this question at all we had better leave it to the courts. I look upon this as a palpable infringement of the contract. It might be applied as a rule for the future by saying that in all future contracts the money shall be deposited in the Treasury, and that no interest shall be allowed; but these contracts expressly provide that the money shall be invested for the benefit of the contractors, and that they shall have the interest. I ask the Senator to be kind enough to read that clause of the charter again.

Mr. PLUMB. The clause reads as follows:

And 10 per cent. of the cost of all new works shall be retained as an additional security and a guarantee fund to keep the same in repair for said term, which said per cent. shall be invested in registered bonds of the United States or of the District of Columbia and the interest thereon paid to said contractors.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is perfectly plain. It is evident that these contractors are entitled to the interest. It may be, however, that on account of the high price of the bonds no interest could accrue, because the diminution of the premium may be more than the interest.

I think the best way is to leave this matter to stand upon the contracts as they exist and to leave the parties their remedy and not to seek by legislation to change it. If the Senator from Kansas had changed the provision so as to apply only to future contracts, I should have no objection to it, because the bids may be made with a view to the loss of interest on 10 per cent. of the money due on the contract for the period of five years, as the whole of it must be deposited for five years. If that is understood by the contractor when he makes his contract he has no right to complain; but as to existing contracts it seems to me perfectly clear that you are proposing to take money which belongs to the contractors, money earned under a law by which they were to have the interest on it, and that the Government was simply to act as a trustee for their benefit.

Therefore, as the amendment is plainly objectionable on the ground that this is legislation attached to an appropriation bill, I shall make that point against it, leaving these parties to their remedy in the courts. I think there will be no injustice done if that course is pursued.

Mr. PLUMB. Let me say that the committee have proceeded not on the theory that they were establishing new rules, but they were simply conforming to the rule already established, first by the Secretary of the Treasury, and second by the board.

The Senator from Ohio says there has been no final judgment rendered; but that the contractor himself prevented it by withdrawing his suit.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know who the contractor was.

Mr. PLUMB. In that case also the transaction has been settled, because the contractor accepted from the Government his money and the Treasurer proceeded to deposit the premium. The contractor also had the interest, by the way, but the Treasurer proceeded and deposited the premium to the credit of the United States.

Two things the committee designed to do. They designed to restore this deposit to the Secretary of the Treasury. Now it is in the hands of the commissioners of the District. The committee did not think that was wise. In the next place they proposed that whatever profit is derived hereafter, it having been decided that it did not belong to the contractor, should go, half to the Government and half to the District, and not all to the Government of the United States. Of course if we adopt the amendment the contractors will have a perfect right to bring their suit anyhow, as I think, so far as that part of it goes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want by law to undertake to change a contract.

Mr. PLUMB. I have no objection to the Senator making the point of order and letting the provision go entirely out of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know but what the United States might have the benefit of the advance in the bonds.

Mr. PLUMB. That is all they have.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly the interest is accruing on those bonds.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator from Ohio thinks this provision affects the interest I will suggest to him to add the words "including interest."

Mr. PLUMB. Yes, I will agree to put in the words "including interest" after the words "due to contractors."

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator will see that it is worded so that all the interest or all the profit growing out of this investment inures to the District of Columbia and the United States.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator agree to such an amendment, putting in after the word "contractors" the words "including interest?"

Mr. ALLISON. It would then read, "in excess of the amounts due to contractors, including interest."

Mr. SHERMAN. "Including interest accruing on said bonds." That will answer.

Mr. PLUMB. That was precisely the purpose the committee had in view.

Mr. SHERMAN. It now reads, "or shall be realized from such investments in excess of the amounts due to contractors." The interest is not due to the contractor.

Mr. ALLISON. The law says the 10 per cent. shall be deposited, and during the deposit the contractor shall have the interest.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it read, "in excess of the amounts due to contractors for the said sum, and the interest thereon." Then I shall be perfectly willing to agree to it.

Mr. PLUMB. Insert after the word "contractors" the words "including interest on said bonds." I think the Senator's first suggestion is the best.

Mr. SHERMAN. "Including all interest on said bonds while so held." I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio suggest an amendment to the amendment of the committee?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do. The Senator from Kansas will state it.

Mr. PLUMB. After the word "contractors," in line 176, add the words:

Including the interest accruing on said bonds while so held.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is right. That will save them their legal rights. If they claim more than that, and claim the benefit of a rise in the value of the bonds, I do not think they will have any right to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 176, after the word "contractors" in the proposed amendment, insert:

Including all interest on said bonds while so held.

So as to read:

And any sum which has been or shall be realized from such investment in excess of the amounts due to contractors, including all interest on said bonds while so held, shall be deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the United States and of the District of Columbia in equal parts.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Even as amended there is some doubt whether this would not be a violation of the contract, because this is obligatory to invest in United States bonds, and one of the advantages of investment in United States bonds is the accretion of the premium. But I do not stand upon that, so long as the language of the contract is complied with and observed. I think that will probably meet my objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. INGALLS in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, in line 563, to increase the total amount of the appropriations for the "health department" from $43,530 to $44,130.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and concluded.

Mr. PLUMB. The committee amendments now having been adopted I move, on page 5, line 97, after the word "thousand," to insert "two hundred," so as to make the salary of the assistant inspector of buildings $1,200. I make that motion on the request of the commissioners.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. The total of the paragraph should be increased to correspond.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator state in what line?

Mr. PLUMB. In line 135, so as to make the total read $65,690 instead of $65,490.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to insert after line 152:

For the purpose of defraying the expenses of the assessment of the real property of the District of Columbia, as provided by the act of March 3, 1883, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. On page 14, line 314, I move to insert the words "purchase of and" before the word "repairs;" so as to read:

Purchase of and repairs to pumps.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. On the same page, line 311, after the word "forty," I move to insert "five," so that the appropriation for "current work on county roads and suburban streets" shall be $45,000 in place of $40,000, and the total should be changed in line 315.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask the Senator from Kansas to explain why it is that he wants $5,000 more for county roads and suburban streets?

Mr. PLUMB. All I know about it is that the commissioners state that they have some work to be done which comes properly within this appropriation which requires its increase from $40,000 to $45,000.

Mr. MORGAN. They ought to come in here with statements that the committee can exhibit.

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator thinks it ought not to go in I have no objection to letting it go out.

Mr. MORGAN. Let it go out then.

Mr. PLUMB. I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. PLUMB. On page 17, line 393, I move to strike out "accident while in actual performance," and insert "injuries received or disease contracted in line;" so as to read:

And said police fund shall be used for the relief of any policeman who by injury received or disease contracted in line of duty or by service not less than fifteen years, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. In line 396, I move to strike out the word "accident" after the word "such," and insert "injury or disease;" so as to read:

And in case of his death from such injury or disease.

I will state that these amendments are made on the suggestion of the policemen whose fund this is, being derived from their salaries.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. There should be a comma after "widow," in line 396.

Mr. HOAR. Is it the intention of the paragraph to require the disability to be caused by the policeman serving more than fifteen years? Suppose he serves thirty or forty years and becomes disabled by old age?

Mr. PLUMB. I understood this covers the whole class of cases where a man is disabled by injury received or disease contracted in the line of duty, or where he——

Mr. HOAR. I inquire whether it really expresses that meaning.

Mr. PLUMB. That was the intention.

Mr. HOAR. It reads:

And said police fund shall be used for the relief of any policeman who, by accident while in actual performance of duty or by service not less than fifteen years, shall become so permanently disabled, &c.

Which would require that the service should have caused the disability.

Mr. PLUMB. That was the intention.

Mr. HOAR. But suppose a man had served thirty years and has become disabled by old age, would you give him then the benefit of the fund? Would it not be well to say that "having served not less than thirty years shall become permanently disabled."

Mr. PLUMB. "Or not having served less than fifteen years."

Mr. HOAR. Yes. I suppose if a man has served fifteen years and has become permanently disabled, and has become a charge upon the service by reason of the disability, it is the intention to give him the benefit of this fund, although the service has not caused the disability. As it is now expressed, it would require the disability to be caused by the service.

Mr. PLUMB. I shall not object to the amendment if the Senator will propose it.

Mr. HOAR. Will not the Senator from Kansas propose his own language?

Mr. PLUMB. At the end of line 393 strike out "by service" and insert "having served." That expresses the idea of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 393, after the word "or," it is proposed to strike out "by service" and insert "having served;" so as to read:

And said police fund shall be used for the relief of any policeman who, by injury received or disease contracted in line of duty, or having served not less than fifteen years, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to add at the close of line 612, on page 26—

And hereafter the supply of Potomac water may be extended to points in the District beyond the limits of Washington and Georgetown upon like terms and conditions as are provided by law for the supply of the same in those cities.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask to have inserted in the RECORD the appendix which is referred to in the provision of the bill making appropriations for the streets.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered if there be no objection.

The paper referred to is as follows:

APPENDIX Gg.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the separate consideration of the amendment on page 8. I ask to have it read in order to modify the language somewhat and call the attention of the Senator from Kansas to it. I ask that that amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 173, after the word "dollars," the following proviso was added:

Provided, That all moneys which have been or which may hereafter be legally retained from contractors shall be invested and held by the Treasurer of the United States, and any sum which has been or shall be realized from such investments in excess of the amounts due to contractors, including all interest on said bonds, shall be deposited in the Treasury, to the credit of the United States and of the District of Columbia in equal parts.

Mr. SHERMAN. To make clear and certain the amendment which was put in at my suggestion, instead of the words inserted in line 176 I will ask that the clause be amended so as to use these words instead of those I offered. My only desire is to carry out the same idea and make it so clear that there will be no controversy. In line 176, after the word "contractors," I wish to insert:

Including the interest on such bonds that has accrued or shall accrue before the full payment to such contractors.

Mr. PLUMB. That is entirely satisfactory.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. That gives them the interest and the Government the profit, whatever it is.

The amendment as amended was concurred in.

The remaining amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MARY ALLEN.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the bill (H. R. 2100) granting a pension to Mary Allen was indefinitely postponed yesterday be reconsidered and the bill placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection that order will be made.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DOLPH. I move to take up for consideration House bill No. 7004, Order of Business 1001, being the bill to repeal all laws providing for the pre-emption of the public lands and the laws allowing entries for timber-culture.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the existing order of the Senate it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, being House bill No. 4976, for the retirement and recoinage of the trade-dollar, pending which the Chair will present bills from the House of Representatives for reference.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 449) to provide for the appraisement and sale of lots in the town of Peru, Dubuque County, Iowa, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill (H. R. 6881) for the relief of the trustees of the Christian Brothers' College, of Saint Louis, Mo., was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

SAINT CROIX RIVER BRIDGE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives non-concurring in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3258) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Saint Croix River at the most accessible point between Stillwater and Taylor's Falls, Minn., and asking a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and grant the conference asked by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. CONGER, Mr. MCMILLAN, and Mr. VEST were appointed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] has been recognized.

Mr. BECK. The unfinished business having been laid before the Senate, I merely desire to say that being a member of the Committee on Finance, and not agreeing with the majority of the committee, I wish to say something in regard to the subject on Monday, when it comes up. I do not want to take the floor unless I am entitled to it; but if I am, I should like when the bill comes up again to be recognized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has previously recognized the Senator from Oregon, who was interrupted by laying messages before the Senate.

Mr. BECK. I beg pardon; I was not aware of that.

Mr. DOLPH. If it is the understanding that the present order of business is to be concluded at this time, of course I do not want to antagonize it; but I do not want other bills to be considered before that is disposed of, to the exclusion of the bill referred to by me; therefore I make the motion to take up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 7004) to repeal all laws providing for the pre-emption of the public lands and the laws allowing entries for timber-culture.

Mr. DAWES. Does the Senator from Kentucky propose to go on to-night?

Mr. BECK. No, I do not. I propose when the silver bill is called up on Monday to have the floor.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator from Kentucky does not wish to proceed to-night I should like to call up a bill which I think will cause no debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A motion to proceed to the consideration of another bill is not, under the rules, open to debate.

Mr. DOLPH. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator from Kentucky does not desire to go on now, I ask that the unfinished business be informally laid aside that I may call up Order of Business 1112.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the Senator from Kentucky is recognized by the Chair as entitled to the floor when the unfinished business shall be resumed.

Mr. BECK. I am satisfied with the announcement of the Chair.

Mr. DAWES. Now I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill I have named.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 1112, being the bill (S. 2609) to provide permanent reservations for the Indians in Northern Montana, and for other purposes. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. HARRIS. I do not think we can consider that bill this evening.

Mr. DAWES. Does the Senator desire to object to it?

Mr. HARRIS. I think it is a bill perhaps too important to be considered at this hour of the evening.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator thinks it will cause debate, I do not want to take time.

Mr. HOAR. I rose to move to proceed to the consideration of executive business, but I do not want to interfere with my colleague.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator from Tennessee thinks this bill will cause debate, I shall not urge that it be taken up now.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HAMPTON. May I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to withdraw that motion for a moment?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

TENEDORE TEN EYCK.

Mr. HAMPTON. I have a bill that has been at the head of the Calendar for several weeks, and I am sure that it will not take five minutes to consider and pass it, and I should be very glad to have action upon it to-night, if possible.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the Senate at the present time consider a bill. Will he name it?

Mr. HAMPTON. If it leads to any debate I shall consent to its postponement. It is the bill (S. 1300) to authorize the President to restore Tenedore Ten Eyck to his former rank in the Army, and to place him upon the retired-list of Army officers. I think, with a word of explanation, that bill will lead to no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill named by the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HOAR. Let the bill be read informally for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length for information, subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk read the bill (S. 1300) to authorize the President to restore Tenedore Ten Eyck to his former rank in the Army, and to place him upon the retired-list of Army officers; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. PLATT. Is there a report in that case? If so, let it be read.

Mr. HAMPTON. If Senators will allow me, I think I can save time by an explanation of two or three minutes, which will cover all that is in the report, which is quite a long one. I hope that will be satisfactory. I propose to do it only to save time.

This gentleman went before the retiring board, having a very severe illness. He was examined, and the board, while admitting that his disease was of a very serious character, thought that it was not permanent. He was therefore not recommended for retirement, and was dropped subsequently from the rolls of the Army; but an examination by a very large number of physicians—all their affidavits are in the report—proved that up to six days before the examination, and from that day to this, he has been a confirmed invalid. The only obstacle in the way at all was that the retiring board had given an adverse verdict upon the case.

One of the members of that board, General Miles, is now in the city, and I communicated with him upon the subject and submitted to him the affidavits of all these eminent surgeons, and he writes this:

EBBITT HOUSE, Washington, D. C., January 22, 1885.

MADAM: In regard to your husband's retirement from the Army in 1871, I can only say that, to the best of my recollection, he appeared before the retiring board at Leavenworth, Kans., in the autumn of 1870, of which I was a member. The report of the medical officers who examined him was that his disability was not of a permanent nature. From what I can learn of his case since I have no doubt that his disease was not temporary but of a chronic order.

Respectfully,

NELSON A. MILES.

Mrs. T. TEN EYCK.

Assistant Surgeon-General Perrin was one of the medical officers who thought the disease was not permanent. I received a dispatch from him. Somebody had sent him a copy of the report of the Military Committee.

FORT SNELLING, MINN., February 3, 1885.

To Senator WADE HAMPTON,
United States Senate, Washington:

Have received the report of your committee. From the affidavits therein given it appears that the diseases from which Captain Ten Eyck suffered at the time he was before the retiring board have proven permanent in character. The short time he was before the board gave little opportunity of judging of the permanency or chronic nature of the diarrhea. It is not unlikely that the board may have erred in its findings.

G. PERRIN,
Assistant Surgeon-General United States Army.

I will say further, and I am sure that will satisfy the whole Senate, that my friend, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], who is on the committee and was originally opposed to this bill, upon seeing these letters and telegrams from the Assistant Surgeon-General, has admitted the justness of this claim, and said he would go for the bill, and I am sure if he goes for it nobody in the Senate will make any objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HOAR. I now renew the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] objects to the reference of this resolution.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table, with a view of having a disagreement in the amendments of the Senate, House bill 5461, known as the "interstate-commerce bill."

Mr. WASHBURN. Mr. Speaker, we do not understand the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks to take from the Speaker's table House bill 5461 in order that Senate amendments thereto may be disagreed to and a committee of conference appointed. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5461) to establish a board of commissioners of interstate commerce, and to prohibit unjust discriminations by common carriers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks to take this bill from the Speaker's table with a view of reaching a conference with the Senate.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

JACOB PINDLE.

Mr. OATES, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Accounts:

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution (H. Res. 309) extending the permission granted Maj. William Ludlow by the act of February 28, 1883, to accept a civil position; when the Speaker signed the same.

CHRISTIAN BROTHERS' COLLEGE, SAINT LOUIS, MO.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule, the Chair will now entertain a motion to take up bills and joint resolutions for consideration, the order beginning at twenty-two minutes past 12 o'clock. The first bill in order is the unfinished business coming over from yesterday, which is House bill 6881 on the Private Calendar, for the relief of the trustees of the Christian Brothers' College, of Saint Louis, Mo., reported with an amendment, and which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] asks be taken up for consideration.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I will yield to my colleague [Mr. BROADHEAD], in whose district the college referred to was located. Their present college is in mine.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate on both sides under the rule has been exhausted, and the question now is, Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. Has the ten minutes of debate been exhausted?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It was exhausted on yesterday in the reading of the report. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The question then recurred on the pending amendment to strike out "35" and insert "20;" so that it will read:

That there be paid to the trustees of the Christian Brothers' College, of Saint Louis, in the State of Missouri, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $20,000, in full compensation for the use and occupation of the buildings and lands of said college during the late war by the United States troops and for injury to and destruction of property belonging to said trustees by said troops.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill as amended was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

APPRAISEMENT AND SALE OF LOTS, PERU, IOWA.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up for present consideration from the House Calendar a bill (H. R. 449) to provide for the appraisement and sale of lots in the town of Peru, Dubuque County, Iowa.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas under an act approved July 2, 1836, and an act amendatory thereto, approved March 3, 1837, entitled "An act for laying off the towns of Fort Madison and Burlington, in the county of Des Moines, and the towns of Bellevue, Dubuque, and Peru, in the county of Dubuque," &c., certain disposition was therein provided for the lands set off for such towns; and

Whereas the site for the said town of Peru, in the year 1840, and the lots thus reserved, have been settled upon by bona fide settlers, who have made valuable improvements thereon: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States appoint three commissioners, any two of whom shall be a quorum to do business, who, before entering upon the discharge of their duties, shall take an oath to faithfully perform the same. Said commissioners shall have power, and it is hereby made their duty, to view said lots and appraise their value, not taking into consideration the improvements thereon; after which appraisement the proper register and the proper receiver shall expose said lots to public sale to the highest bidder, after advertising the same in three public newspapers at least three months, reserving from such sale such lots as, according to the records of the General Land Office, have already been paid for or patented: Provided, That the actual settlers upon said lots who have made valuable improvements thereon shall first be entitled to purchase the same at their appraised value.

SEC. 2. That said commissioners shall each be entitled to $5 per day for each day actually employed as provided above, to be paid by the receiver of public moneys of the proper land district.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Discussion is now in order for ten minutes; five minutes on each side.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, a bill identical with this has twice passed the Senate. It was unanimously reported from the Committee on the Public Lands in the Forty-seventh Congress, and this bill is reported unanimously by that committee in this Congress. The lands affected by it lie in the district of my friend from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], and he having personal knowledge of the facts connected with it, I yield to him the time for explanation.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, this bill is local in its character. I desire to say, in the first place, that it passed in the Forty-sixth Congress, passed the Senate in the Forty-seventh Congress, but failed of passage in the House of Representatives for the sole reason it was not reached on the Calendar.

In 1836, on July 2, it was provided that certain lots should be laid out for the town of Peru, in Dubuque County; my own county. It ran along until 1841, when it was discovered instead of being able to build a town at Peru, the city of Dubuque, four miles off, had sprung up, owing to its peculiar location and the attraction of the lead mines. This defeated the building of a town at Peru, and it was wholly abandoned, and the section of land was settled upon by squatters, and has been occupied since 1840–'41. The squatters hold no title whatever, and it has paid no taxes to the county of Dubuque or the State of Iowa.

This legislation, which has been recommended by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, as detailed in the report, is for the sole purpose of appointing commissioners to appraise the value of the lots, not taking in consideration the improvements thereon, and that the bona fide settlers upon said lots—and they are occupied by gardeners who supply the market of the city of Dubuque—shall first be entitled to purchase the same at their appraised value.

That is the whole purpose of the bill. The county attorney of Dubuque County and other citizens of the county have asked Senator ALLISON of the Senate, and myself in the House, to exert ourselves to secure the passage of the bill. It is desired by everybody there that it shall pass. The land-owners themselves desire it, because they prefer to have their titles vested rather than go on making improvements with this uncertainty resting upon them. The county of Dubuque and the State of Iowa desire it, because then they can compel the owners of this land, or the families resident upon it, to pay taxes as well as the rest of the citizens of the State. That is the whole purpose of the bill.

I will yield now for any gentlemen who may desire to ask any questions, if there be any present who feel any trouble about the matter.

The bill, I repeat, is purely local in its character.

Mr. WELLER. I ask for the reading of the report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa can demand the reading of the report in the time allowed for debate in opposition to the bill, but not in the time of the gentleman from Illinois, who has two minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. PAYSON. May I say to the gentleman from Iowa that this report simply recommends the passage of the bill and embodies in it a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office recommending its passage.

Mr. WELLER. Owing to the confusion prevailing in the Hall I can hear the report read much better than the statement of the gentleman himself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Iowa desire to occupy his time?

Mr. PAYSON. I will reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair then will recognize the gentleman from Iowa on the right of the Chair for five minutes in opposition.

Mr. WELLER. In that time I request the report to be read.

The report (by Mr. LEWIS) was read, as follows:

The acts of July 2, 1836, and March 3, 1837 (5 Statutes, pages 70 and 178), provided for the sale of the lots in five towns in the then Territory of Wisconsin, including the town of Peru, mentioned in said bill. The act of 1837 authorized certain commissioners to adjudicate all pre-emption claims to any of the lots in the towns in question, and thereafter the proper local officers were empowered to expose the residue of the lots to public sale under the regulations in the third section of the said act of 1837. The lands selected for the town of Peru were parts of sections 25, 26, 35, and 36, township 90 north, range 2 east. The town was laid off into 267 lots of various sizes, with intersecting streets and alleys.

The first lot was sold April 26, 1841; and from that time until October 7, 1853, eighty-one lots were disposed of to the several claimants under the third section of said act of 1837. The entries covering said lots were all patented December 1, 1846, except two, which were patented October 19, 1853, and the patents transmitted to the local office, then at Dubuque, and it is supposed they were all delivered to the patentees. The town of Peru is now wholly abandoned as a town, and the land is wholly occupied for farming purposes by settlers who have no title, the title remaining in the Government. It has been wholly abandoned as a town, and is unsuited for that purpose.

The Commissioner of the General Land Office, in response to an inquiry made in reference thereto by the Hon. W. B. ALLISON, on the 19th of December, 1881, wrote the following letter:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., December 19, 1881.

SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of the 12th instant, covering a letter addressed to you by W. J. Cantillon, esq., dated Dubuque, December 8, 1881, relative to the town site of Peru, in Dubuque County, Iowa, and stating that a petition had been forwarded asking for legislation looking toward the disposal of the land embraced in said town site. In your letter it is stated that "this land is wholly occupied for farming purposes by settlers who have no title, the title remaining in the Government. It has been wholly abandoned as a town, and is unsuited for that purpose. I think a bill ought to be prepared looking to a sale of this property. It probably should be appraised and the settlers permitted to take it at the appraised value; they failing to do so, to be sold to the highest bidder."

In reply I have the honor to advise you that the matter of the disposal of the land in question has frequently been the subject of correspondence with members of the Senate and House of Representatives, with a view to the passage of a law providing for the sale of said town sites. The acts of July 2, 1836, and March 3, 1837 (5 Stats., 70 and 178), provided for the sale of the lots in five towns in the then Territory of Wisconsin, including said town of Peru. The said act of 1837 authorized certain commissioners to adjudicate all pre-emption claims to any of the lots in the towns in question, and thereafter the proper legal officers were empowered to expose the residue of the lots to public sale, under the regulations in the third section of the said act of 1837.

The land selected for the town of Peru—the same being parts of sections 25, 26, 35, and 36, township 90 north, range 2 east—was laid out into two hundred and sixty-seven lots of various sizes, with intersecting streets and alleys. On April 26, 1841, the first lot was sold, and from that time until October 7, 1853, eighty-one lots were disposed of to the several claimants under the third section of said act of 1837, as will be seen by the inclosed schedule. The entries covering said lots, sixty-one in number, were all patented December 1, 1846, except two, which were patented on October 19, 1853. The patents were all transmitted to the local land office, then at Dubuque, and it is supposed that they were all delivered to the proper parties. I inclose a diagram of the town plat, showing the whole number of lots, with the word "sold," in red ink, marked upon the lots disposed of. I inclose also a diagram of a portion of the township plat, showing the location of the town site.

Under the state of facts as above presented this office can not, in view of the rights of the purchasers, whose names appear in the schedule, recommend that the whole town site be sold, but would urge that some law looking toward the disposal of all the lots remaining unsold should be passed by Congress. The lapse of time since the sale of a lot and the enhanced value of the land suggests the advisability of legislation which will provide for the appraisal of the remaining lots and their sale to the highest bidder at public auction. The rights of the settlers, who, it is alleged, are now residing on the land, should be protected in such a way as Congress, in its wisdom, may direct.

Here follows a list of the inclosures to accompany this communication, viz:
Diagram of town site, marked A.
Diagram of township plat, part, marked B.
Schedule of purchasers of lots, marked C.
I also return Mr. Cantillou's letter.

Respectfully,

N. C. McFARLAND, Commissioner.

Hon. W. B. ALLISON,
United States Senate.

On these lands are squatted a number of people paying no taxes for State or county purposes, though they have enjoyed the use of these lands for years. At the same time these squatters are anxious to get title to the places that they are on. Considering these facts, and following the recommendation of the Commissioner, your committee beg leave to report back the bill and recommend that the same do pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois has two minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. PAYSON. I do not desire to occupy the time, as I think it is not necessary.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PAYSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN V. B. BLEECKER.

Mr. TALBOTT. I ask leave to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 1335, to authorize the settlement of the accounts of the late John V. B. Bleecker, a paymaster in the Navy, and put the same upon its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the accounting officers of the Treasury of the United States be, and they are hereby, directed, in settling the accounts of the late John V. B. Bleecker, a paymaster in the United States Navy, to credit him with the amount charged against him on their books, namely, $3,531.36.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Is there a report accompanying this bill?

Mr. TALBOTT. There is a report. I will say that this bill passed the Senate unanimously, and the report was adopted unanimously by the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I ask that the report be read.

The report is as follows:

The facts in this case are as follows:

Paymaster Bleecker was, at the request of Admiral D. D. Porter, commanding the Mississippi squadron, ordered to duty as purchasing paymaster of that squadron June 8, 1864, and entered upon that duty at Mound City about July 1, 1864.

When he received these orders he was just recovering from a severe attack of illness, incurred by long and arduous service as fleet paymaster in the Gulf squadron. Although far from well, he did not ask for sick-leave, but hastened to carry out his orders.

Paymaster Bleecker remained on duty at Mound City, Ill., until the last of October the same year. At that time he was so ill with typhoid fever that he was sent to his home in New York city, where he died on the 8th of November, 1864, three days after his arrival. His clerk was compelled to accompany him to New York, and, consequent to such a hurried departure, no time was had to place any one in charge of his office. His papers, accounts, vouchers, bills, personal effects, &c., were left behind, and, no one properly looking after them, were hurriedly and confusedly packed in boxes and shipped to the Fourth Auditor for adjustment and settlement. His widow states that she has never been able to obtain his personal effects. The Fourth Auditor states that his accounts as rendered show that Paymaster Bleecker, while on duty as purchasing paymaster, Mississippi squadron, received moneys from the United States amounting to $818,400, and disbursed upon three hundred and eighty-four vouchers the sum of $325,124.60, and there was returned to the Government $489,611.50, leaving apparently unaccounted for $3,663.86. This balance was reduced, however, by credits allowed him, $133, and by an error in his account of 50 cents against him, leaving the amount charged against him on the books of the Treasury Department $3,531.36.

In collecting his papers, many vouchers and receipted bills for stores purchased were undoubtedly lost or destroyed, which if they could have been found would have satisfactorily accounted for the apparent deficit now held in said Bleecker's accounts.

His entire record from his entry into the naval service in 1847 is an excellent one. His accounts have always been rendered promptly and satisfactorily, and as an evidence that the accounting officers do not think there was any criminal intent on the part of Paymaster Bleecker it need only be said that he has now been dead twenty years, and they have never taken any steps toward compelling his bondsmen to make up the apparent indebtedness to the Government of the United States. The committee call special attention to this fact, and believe it will be accepted as conclusive evidence that Bleecker never entertained an idea of defrauding the Government which he so faithfully served, and to which he gave his life.

His widow is poor and has a family; she prays Congress to annul this amount charged against her late husband; she does not wish to have his name handed down as a defaulter, and takes a becoming pride in wishing to wipe out this apparent dishonor of the father of her children.

Congress has passed several bills relieving paymasters of similar charges held against them on the books of the Government.

In the Forty-fifth Congress a law passed for the relief of Paymaster Cushing, who had charged against him $10,000; in the Thirty-ninth Congress there was enacted a law for the relief of Paymaster James Fulton; in the Forty-sixth Congress a bill for the relief of Pay-Director Cunningham, whose clerk (an officer for whom he was responsible) embezzled funds under the paymaster; and again in the Forty-seventh Congress an act was passed relieving Edward K. Winship, an acting assistant paymaster, of funds charged against him to the extent of $5,098.

Your committee, therefore, recommend the passage of this bill, believing it to be but a simple act of justice.

The record of service of the late Paymaster Bleecker is herewith given:

[During the reading of the report the hammer fell.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time allowed for debate in support of the bill has expired.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I take the floor for the time allowed in opposition, and ask that the reading of the report be concluded.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the report as above.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill if this is the same bill that passed the Senate?

Mr. TALBOTT. Yes, sir; and reported unanimously from the Senate committee, as well as from the House committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read by its title a first and second time, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TALBOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DRAWBACK ON CERTAIN IMPORTED MATERIAL.

Mr. RUSSELL. I ask to call up the bill (H. R. 7651) to amend section 3019 of the Revised Statutes, relating to drawback on duties on imported material when manufactured and exported.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 3019 of the Revised Statutes be amended so that it will read:

"SEC. 3019. There shall be allowed on all articles wholly manufactured of materials imported, on which duties have been paid, when exported, a drawback equal in amount to the duty paid on such materials, and no more, to be ascertained under such regulations as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury; and all provisions of law inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed."

Mr. MILLS. I make the point of order that that bill was called up under this rule for consideration the other day and was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What point does the gentleman make?

Mr. MILLS. That it is not competent to call up a bill under this rule which has been called up and refused to be considered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not understand that the point of order is good in its application to the operation of this rule. This bill is on the Calendar, and the gentleman has the right to call it up.

Mr. MILLS. Can the gentleman offer the same bill repeatedly under this rule?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not know of anything in the rule to prevent any gentleman who is recognized from offering the same bill, if he shall see proper to do so.

Mr. MILLS. I think there ought to be, if there is not, some limit, so that he shall not ask day after day to consider the same bill.

Mr. WELLER. I raised the same question of order the other day, and I should like to have a decision of the Chair upon it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair decided it then, and overrules the point of order now.

The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for five minutes in support of the bill.

Mr. RUSSELL. I propose to submit an amendment to the bill.

Mr. WELLER. I wish to inquire if the time for offering objections has arrived?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has not. The Chair will call for objection after the time for debate has expired.

The Chair will state to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the time has not arrived for offering amendments to the bill, as it is not yet before the House.

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT].

Mr. HERBERT. This bill simply proposes that instead of 10 per cent. being retained upon all goods manufactured wholly of foreign material, the drawback shall be 100 per cent. This policy, Mr. Speaker, has long obtained. The law at present allows a drawback of 90 per cent. upon all goods manufactured of foreign material. This bill proposes to allow 100 per cent. The 10 per cent. at present retained was originally provided for in order to pay the expenses of collecting the drawback.

In the case of sugar the amount of cost has been found to be not as much as 1 per cent., and consequently heretofore the law has been so changed as to allow 99 per cent. to be refunded on sugars. This bill proposes to allow 100 per cent. on everything.

In committee I preferred that the drawback should be 99 per cent., and that the Government should retain 1 per cent. to indemnify it against the cost of collection. But the 1 per cent. is a matter of little or no importance.

The principle of the bill is simply this: To allow foreign material imported here to be marked up by our own people for exportation without any duties being charged by the Government. I can not see how it will injuriously affect any interest in this country. It will simply result in giving employment to a larger number of workmen without affecting the general interests of the business of the country. The amount of foreign material that can be imported into this country and worked up into manufactures for exportation will never be very large so long as labor with us is higher than it is in foreign countries.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL] has two minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. RUSSELL. I desire to say that this bill is in the interest of American manufactures and American labor. The present law provides that when an article manufactured wholly of imported material on which a duty has been paid and the manufactured article is exported, it is entitled to a drawback of 90 per cent. This bill provides that the whole amount of duty on the imported material shall be paid back, which enables us to more successfully compete with many articles of domestic manufacture in a foreign market; and I hope that this—being in the interest of American labor—bill will pass.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts for one moment permit an inquiry?

Mr. RUSSELL. Certainly.

Mr. DINGLEY. As I understand, the law since 1799 has provided for a drawback of 90 per cent. on all articles imported for manufacture when re-exported. And I understand the only amendment proposed is to make the drawback 100 per cent. instead of 90.

Mr. RUSSELL. That is the effect of it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] to control the time in opposition to the bill.

Mr. MILLS. A long time ago a law was made that 90 per cent. of the duty paid on all articles entering into manufactures that were re-exported should be refunded to the party paying the tax. That has been the policy of the Government for many years. It is proposed now by this bill to give to the manufacturer the whole of the money that he pays on the raw material entering into the manufactures that are re-exported. The doctrine has been stated by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] this morning that that 10 per cent. was retained in order to pay the cost of collection. I have always understood all taxes were imposed by the Government of the United States for the purpose of raising revenue. But now we are told this tax was imposed simply to pay the expense of collection. Here is the position assumed by the manufacturers: They are in favor of free trade as far as it concerns all raw materials which they buy in order to manufacture goods to sell in the open markets of the world, and they are opposed to every reduction of taxation on the finished product that the people of the United States have to consume. That is just the proposition of this bill; to give to the manufacturers absolute and unconditional free trade in all the materials entering into the manufacture of their products, while you charge the people of the United States 100, 110, 120, 140, and 150 per cent., and refuse all the time to permit the reduction of one farthing on the necessaries of life to the poorest part of our population. I hope there are gentlemen enough in this House who have not bowed their knees to Baal to prevent the consummation of such a purpose.

Mr. WELLER. There are.

Mr. HERBERT. I wish to ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] has it not been the rule in all administrations from the beginning of the Government to allow this drawback—even in the Walker tariff?

Mr. MILLS. Ninety per cent. has been the rule all the time.

Mr. HERBERT. In all administrations. And I ask the gentleman further: Will he deny that the 10 per cent. retained was for the purpose of paying the cost of collection?

Mr. WASHBURN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Texas whether this changes the principle of paying drawbacks.

Mr. MILLS. It changes the principle as far as the paying back of the 10 per cent. is concerned.

Mr. WASHBURN. Then you should change it altogether.

Mr. WELLER. I should like to hear the report read.

Mr. MILLS. Oh, no; let us vote.

Mr. WELLER. I withdraw the demand for the reading of the report.

Objections being called for, more than the requisite number of members objected.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT NEW ALBANY.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I call up the bill (S. 1040) to provide for the construction of a public building at New Albany, Ind.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase, or otherwise procure, a suitable site for a public building, which site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of not less than fifty feet, including streets and alleys, and cause to be erected thereon, at the city of New Albany, in the State of Indiana, a substantial and commodious public building, with fire-proof vaults, for the use of the United States district and circuit courts, the internal-revenue service, and the post-office; the plans and estimates for said building having first been prepared, examined, and approved as required by section 3734 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, upon calculations and specifications that will insure the completion of the building at a cost not to exceed the sum of $100,000, which sum is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That no money to be appropriated for said building shall be used until a valid title to the site selected shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Indiana shall have ceded to the United States jurisdiction over the same for all purposes during the time the Government shall be or remain the owner thereof, except for the enforcement of the criminal laws of the State and the service of civil process therein.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. In 1857, when the construction branch of the Treasury Department was under the control of Captain Bowman, an engineer officer of the Army, he recommended the construction of a public building at the city of New Albany. He also repeated that recommendation in 1858 and 1859. Since that time the city has more than doubled in population and commercial importance. Thirteen years ago Federal courts were established there. This bill, or a similar one, was favorably reported in the Forty-sixth and Forty-seventh Congresses. The present bill has passed the Senate unanimously. A similar bill has been reported to this House and considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and after full discussion it passed that committee by a vote of 151 to 20. I hope there will be no objection to this bill and that it will pass.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Is there a report?

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Let it be read.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I have it here. It is the report on the House bill, not on the Senate bill. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] desires it read, I ask that it be read in his time.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. No. I want to offer an amendment to the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to suggest to my colleague [Mr. STOCKSLAGER], as chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, that one of the most serious objections to bills of this class is that there is never any certainty that the amount appropriated will finally complete the building.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I suggest to my colleague that that is not the fault of Congress. This bill is now carefully guarded on that point.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope we will make it the fault of Congress if it occurs hereafter. With a view of obviating that objection to this bill, I shall move to amend by striking out the remainder of the paragraph after the words "United States," in line 15, and inserting the amendment which I send to the desk and ask the Clerk to read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will inform the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that the bill is not before the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am making a suggestion to my colleague [Mr. STOCKSLAGER] as to this amendment, and I wish the Clerk to read the language now contained in the paragraph after the words "United States," as I have indicated, and the amendment which I propose.

The Clerk read a portion of the bill, as follows:

Upon calculations and specifications that will insure the completion of the building at a cost not to exceed the sum of $100,000, which sum is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Clerk has read enough. Now I ask my colleague to accept an amendment which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, after the site for said building shall have been purchased, to cause a plan and specifications of said building to be prepared, which plan and specifications shall not involve an expenditure, in the erection and completion of said building and the approaches thereto, exceeding the portion of said $100,000 remaining after the site of said building shall have been paid for; and no plan for said building shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury involving an expenditure exceeding the sum so remaining after paying for the site of said building.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, the real trouble with these appropriations for public buildings, the thing which excites indignation all over the country, is, that when an appropriation is made for the erection of a building at a given cost it nearly always happens that a large portion of the sum appropriated is expended for the site, combinations are formed, and Congress is called upon for additional appropriations. It is to correct that evil in this case that I propose this amendment, and I hope my colleague [Mr. STOCKSLAGER] will accept it.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that so far as I am concerned I would have no objection at all to this amendment, but——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. The remarks of my colleague [Mr. HOLMAN] were not to be taken out of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STOCKSLAGER] is exhausted.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, it was distinctly stated that the time occupied by my colleague [Mr. HOLMAN] was not to be taken out of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's colleague [Mr. HOLMAN] controls the time on the other side, and probably the gentlemen can arrange as to the time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the time that I consumed should not be charged to my colleague [Mr. STOCKSLAGER].

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I merely want to suggest that that amendment is right in principle, but I do not——

Mr. WILLIS. If the gentleman in charge of this bill [Mr. STOCKSLAGER] will permit me, I will suggest that he is putting the bill "in a hole," because when an amendment is adopted here the bill must go back to the Senate.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. That is the difficulty. The amendment is right in itself; but if it were adopted the bill would have to go back to the Senate, and at this late day in the session it probably could not be considered there. If it were a House bill, or if it were earlier in the session, I should accept the amendment without hesitation.

Mr. HOLMAN. I guess the Senate can act upon it.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. The Forty-sixth and Forty-seventh Congresses adopted a form of bill for public buildings which, as completely as seemed practicable, limited the amount of the original appropriation, and this goes a step further in the same direction.

The amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. HOLMAN] is right in itself, but I trust he will not press it, because if this bill is amended and goes back to the Senate it can not be considered at this session.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I was about to offer an amendment to this bill——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will inform the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] that the bill is not before the House.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I was about to offer an amendment (to be read in my time) of the same purport as that which has been suggested by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], but as his covers the ground I withhold mine.

I wish, however, to offer a few reasons and present a few facts to show why such an amendment should be adopted upon every bill of this kind. I desire to cite from the report of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department some figures on this subject.

In the case of the post-office at Harrisburg, Pa., the cost was originally limited to $160,000. For that building there has already been appropriated $410,000. In the case of the building at Nashville, Tenn., the cost was originally limited to $150,000, and there have been appropriated for that building $424,000. For the court-house at Pittsburgh, Pa., the limit of cost was originally fixed at $300,000. Eight hundred thousand dollars have already been expended upon that building, and this House recently passed a bill appropriating—how much more? A million more, I believe. In the case of the court-house at Parkersburg, Va., the cost was originally limited to $150,000, and $243,000 have been appropriated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time for debate on this bill has expired.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. There are a dozen other cases of this kind which I might state if time were allowed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BENNETT. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust my colleague [Mr. STOCKSLAGER] will accept the amendment I have suggested.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. It may be offered and voted upon.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I have no objection to the bill if the amendment be accepted.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I have no objection to the amendment being offered and voted upon by the House, but do not like to accept it for the reasons I have stated.

Objections being called for, thirteen members objected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection being made by more than ten members, the bill is not before the House.

ALTAR, ETC., FOR CATHOLIC CHURCH, CARROLLTOWN, PA.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Pennsylvania. I ask that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill which I send to the desk and that it be now considered and passed.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7551) admitting free of duty an altar and church regalia for the Catholic church at Carrolltown, Pa.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to admit free of import duty thirteen cases of church regalia imported by Dugelsledt & Co., August 25, 1884, in the steamer Werra, from Bremen to New York, marked "L. C. B.," and numbered from 620 to 632, inclusive, containing a Gothic altar, with statues for the same, imported by order and for the exclusive use of the Catholic church at Carrolltown, Pa.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Ten minutes are now allowed for the discussion of this bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Pennsylvania. I will not now occupy the time of the House by discussing the bill. The simple reading of it explains its purpose. I do not think there will be any objection to its consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. WELLER. I call for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. HISCOCK) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7551) admitting free of duty an altar and church regalia for the Catholic church at Carrolltown, Pa., have had the same under consideration, and respectfully report:

That the proposed remission of duty is upon articles exclusively for the use of a religious institution, and not for sale, and following a precedent established by the passage of many such claims, the committee recommend the enactment of this bill into law.

Mr. WELLER. I have no objection to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. There is objection.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Was there discussion on this bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The opportunity was offered, but no gentleman took the floor to debate the bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I wished simply to ask a question—why the articles named in the bill can not be admitted free of duty under the existing law without a special act? Upon articles imported for charitable or religious purposes there is no duty imposed by the law, as I understand.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Pennsylvania. It was supposed that these articles would come in free of duty, but the ruling of the Treasury Department was otherwise; hence the necessity of the passage of this bill.

Objections being called for, only five members objected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill is now before the House for consideration. The first question is upon ordering it to be engrossed and read a third time.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 105, noes 7.

Mr. SKINNER, of North Carolina. No quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. SKINNER, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. CAMPBELL.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 157, noes 14.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MOBILE AND OHIO RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. I call up for present consideration the joint resolution (S. R. 4) to provide for settlement of accounts with the Mobile and Ohio Railroad Company.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas by act of Congress approved February 27, 1875, entitled "An act to provide for settlement with certain railway companies," the Secretary of War and the Attorney-General were authorized to make such abatements in the accounts of the companies named in said act as they might find just; and

Whereas the Secretary of War and the Attorney-General having determined and agreed upon a basis for such abatements and settlements, it was found that the Mobile and Ohio Railroad Company had so far paid its accounts that the abatements determined upon would not only extinguish the balance claimed against said company, but would also require the return of a portion of the money already paid by it; and

Whereas the said act not making any appropriation or provision for the return of any money, no settlement was made with the Mobile and Ohio Railroad Company as contemplated by said act, and its accounts still remain unadjusted and unsettled: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War and the Attorney-General be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed jointly to adjust and finally settle the accounts of the United States with the Mobile and Ohio Railroad Company for property received from the United States in the years 1865 and 1866, as provided for in the act of Congress approved February 27, 1875, and upon the same basis of settlement and upon the same terms and conditions as was done with other companies included in said act.

SEC. 2. That when said accounts have been adjusted, if it shall be found that the adjustment upon the basis herein provided for requires the return of any money heretofore paid by the Mobile and Ohio Railroad Company on said accounts, the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue his warrant on the Treasury of the United States in favor of said company for the amount of money so to be returned; and the amount necessary for such purpose is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. WELLER (during the reading of the joint resolution). Mr. Speaker, I make the point that the hour for the consideration of bills under this order has expired.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour has now expired. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER] will be recognized again when this order is reached.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. This will come up in the next hour under this order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will come up in the hour of Monday next.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GIBSON. During the discussion yesterday on the river and harbor bill, a colloquy occurred between the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors [Mr. WILLIS] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG]. It struck me at the time there was misapprehension on the part of both gentlemen as to what was said. Since that time I have carefully examined the RECORD, and I have had conversations with both gentlemen as well as other gentlemen on this floor, and I am satisfied a statement——

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I rise, Mr. Speaker, to a question of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I make the point that the gentleman from West Virginia is not stating any question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As far as the gentleman has gone the Chair does not think he is stating any question of personal privilege.

Mr. GIBSON. I could not make myself understood without first making a preliminary statement.

Mr. KEIFER. For how long a time?

Mr. GIBSON. I will be brief.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will ask the gentleman to state his question of personal privilege.

Mr. GIBSON. There was language used which was taken to be a reflection on a member of this House by another member.

Mr. KEIFER. Was it on you?

Mr. GIBSON. Yes; on me partially. I can not see why any gentleman should object——

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to know if it is in order for me to ask by unanimous consent that pending the consideration of the river and harbor appropriation bill every gentleman upon the floor who may desire to do so shall have the right to print in the RECORD whatever he may choose, as a matter of personal privilege, so as not otherwise to take up the time and attention of the House. If so, I will ask unanimous consent for that purpose. ["Good!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. Yes, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from West Virginia will state his question of personal privilege.

Mr. GIBSON. I was about to state that in the language used yesterday it appeared the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] reflected on members of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors as well as on the chairman of that committee.

Mr. STORM. Did he reflect on you?

Mr. GIBSON. Yes; for I am a member of that committee.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I still insist on my point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And the Chair feels compelled to sustain the point of order, as the gentleman from West Virginia, in the judgment of the Chair, has not stated any question of personal privilege. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. GIBSON. I will try then to restate it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair must recognize the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] to a privileged report.

PROTECTION OF CHILDREN.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I submit the following privileged conference report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to bill of the Senate No. 729 "for the protection of children in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

I. In line 20, page 1 of the bill, that the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with the addition of the words "or sight," so that the clause will read "in their presence or sight;" and the House agree to the same.

II. In line 27, page 2 of the bill, that in lieu of the word "twenty-one," as amended by the House to read "sixteen," both Houses agree to the substitution of the word "eighteen."

WM. L. WILSON,
J. THOS. SPRIGGS,
E. JEFFORDS,
Managers on the part of the House.
H. H. RIDDLEBERGER,
AUSTIN F. PIKE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement accompanying the report is as follows:

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses to the amendments of the House to the bill of the Senate 729 "for the protection of children in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," submit the following statement in explanation of the conference report:

I. In section 2 of the original bill authority was conferred on certain officers "to arrest without warrant all persons violating within their view any law relating to or affecting the protection of children," &c. The House substituted for the words "within their view" the words "in their presence," as less equivocal. The Senate agrees to this amendment with the addition of the words "or sight," so that the clause will read, line 20, page 1 of the bill, "in their presence or sight;" and the House consent to this addition.

II. In section 4 of the bill it was made criminal "to entice, decoy, place, or take any female child under the age of 21 years into any house of ill-fame," &c. The House substituted "16 years" for "21 years." Both Houses now agree on "18 years."

WM. L. WILSON,
E. JEFFORDS,
J. THOS. SPRIGGS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I ask the adoption of that report.

The report was adopted.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, I desire to correct some inaccuracies in the RECORD of this morning, and that may involve incidentally the necessity of correcting myself somewhat.

Mr. KEIFER. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee has a right to correct the RECORD.

Mr. KEIFER. That is, if he states the RECORD reports him inaccurately then that is a correction of the RECORD.

Mr. YOUNG. If the gentleman will let me alone I will state briefly what I desire.

Mr. KEIFER. It is a question of privilege to correct the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman said that was his object.

Mr. YOUNG. Who decides the question, the gentleman from Ohio, or the Chair?

Mr. KEIFER. If the gentleman is so facetious about it, the Chair has been trying to be very kind to him——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee will state his correction.

Mr. KEIFER. He stated he rose to a correction of the RECORD. I understood him to say that he rose to a question of privilege to correct himself.

Mr. YOUNG. Is it not a question of personal privilege to correct the RECORD?

Mr. KEIFER. No, sir.

Mr. YOUNG. I do not understand what a question of privilege is, then.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will address the Chair.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, what I wish to say in brief is this: The RECORD this morning reports me as saying in my remarks yesterday that I had had a conversation with every member on the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and I found but one who assumed the responsibility of a measure to which I objected. I did not think I had made such a statement until I was informed by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] and one or two other gentlemen that that was my language. When my attention was called to it I corrected it in a subsequent part of my remarks.

I did not intend to state that I had had a conversation with every member of the committee. I did intend to state what was a fact, and what I thought I had stated, that I had spoken to a number of members, and that every member to whom I had spoken, while not perhaps using the exact language employed by me, in substance disavowed any responsibility in connection with it; and every one of these gentlemen did say—that is, every one with whom I spoke—that he was of opinion that this particular appropriation should be made, but the committee decided differently. That statement I had made to the chairman of the committee three days before I uttered it upon the floor of this House. I certainly had no intention of attacking the motives of any member of the committee, nor to question their right to pursue their own convictions of public duty. I only intended in an emphatic but respectful manner to express my dissent from their views, and this I had a perfect right to do, but I had no intention of being offensive to any single one of them.

Mr. Speaker, this question affects a great interest that has been confided to my care in this House, and I felt it to be my duty to protect that interest with all the power I could command. I conceived it to be my duty to point out what I believed to be the errors and omissions which appeared in the bill. That it was my duty to do, and had I failed in it I should have been unfaithful to the trust confided to me by the people who sent me here to represent them and their interests. The misunderstanding what I said has grown out of the necessity I was under of attempting to crowd an hour's speech into five minutes' time, and in undertaking to accomplish such a thing as that it is quite natural that some mistakes should occur. I repeat now that I disclaim any intention of reflecting unjustly upon a member of the committee in the remarks that I made yesterday, nor would I have believed that I made some attributed to me, nor that they could have been construed as offensive, had I not been informed by a number of gentlemen, perhaps less liable to be mistaken than I, that they were open to that criticism.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the gentleman from Tennessee has made this statement. I knew very well that my friend from Tennessee would not misrepresent anybody on this floor or anywhere else, and when he stated that he had a conversation with every member of the committee upon this subject, I knew that the statement was made in error and in the heat of debate and discussion, for he had not had any conversation with me upon the subject.

Mr. THOMAS. Nor did he have any with me.

Mr. YOUNG. Nor did I say that I had.

Mr. WILLIS. I hope the House will indulge me for a very few moments, for the reason that a number of gentlemen have called my attention to the fact that the language I made use of on yesterday, in response to the gentleman from Tennessee, might be susceptible of a harsh construction, which I did not intend to give to it. If it be necessary, therefore, I wish now to disclaim in any degree the slightest intention of using any discourteous or offensive language toward the gentleman from Tennessee.

And I may be permitted, Mr. Speaker, in a single moment, in connection with the subject of the improvement of that harbor (Memphis) to say, that had it not been for my efforts in the last Congress, on the conference committee, the appropriation of $200,000, to which reference was made in the debate on yesterday, would not have been granted. This, I believe, is admitted on all hands. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. YOUNG. I hope I will be permitted a single word further. I have now but a last word to say in connection with this subject. I expected this disclaimer from the gentleman from Kentucky. I could not believe that it was his intention to reflect injuriously upon me in what he said or I should perhaps have said more in reply, but I am glad I remembered that the grandest of all victories are won by charity and forbearance, and I felt assured, too, that time and reflection would surely bring regret to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] as they have to me.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE SAINT CROIX RIVER.

Mr. WASHBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table a House bill that has been returned with certain amendments of the Senate for the purpose of moving non-concurrence in the Senate amendments with a view to getting a conference committee appointed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3258) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Saint Croix River at the most accessible point between Stillwater and Taylor's Falls, Minn.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, January 22, 1885.

Resolved, That this bill pass with amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman desire the amendments to be read?

Mr. WASHBURN. I do not. I move that the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate in order to ask for a conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. WASHBURN, Mr. SEYMOUR, and Mr. PETERS.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. LACEY, on account of important business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILLIS. I move that the morning hour for the call of committees be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

REPORT OF LIEUTENANT SCHWATKA.

Mr. ROGERS, of New York. I rise to make a privileged report from the Committee on Printing. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report back with the recommendation that it be adopted the Senate concurrent resolution which I send to the desk.

The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the official report of Lieut. Frederick Schwatka, United States Army, of his military reconnaissance, be printed, and that 3,500 additional copies be printed, of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House, and 500 copies for the use of the War Department.

The report of the committee was read, as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred Senate resolution authorizing the printing of the official report of Lieut. Frederick Schwatka, United States Army, have duly considered the same, and recommend that the House do concur therein.

The cost of printing the additional number of copies is estimated at $5,439.

The resolution was concurred in.

Mr. ROGERS, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILLIS. I move that the House, at the close of its session to-day, take a recess until 10 o'clock on Monday morning.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I call for a division on that motion.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish to inquire if the gentleman from Kentucky means that the House on Monday shall adjourn at 12 o'clock.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 135.

Before the negative vote was counted,

Mr. TOWNSHEND said: I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I want to know if the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] has stated his intention was that the House should adjourn before 12 o'clock on Monday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did not hear any such statement by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The negative vote was counted; and there were—noes 20.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On this question the ayes are 135 and the noes are 20.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, and Mr. TOWNSHEND. No quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point is made that a quorum has not voted. The Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If the understanding is that the House shall adjourn before 12 o'clock on Monday, I shall not insist on the point as to a quorum.

Mr. WILLIS. I call for the regular order.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I ask the Chair to state the question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS], that at the close of this day's session the House shall take a recess until 10 o'clock on Monday morning.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. REED, of Maine. If the House determines that question in the affirmative, and then at the close of this session should adjourn, would it not adjourn until 12 o'clock on Monday?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks it would.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Then I do not see what good can result from this motion, even if it be decided in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House can not be stripped of its power to adjourn when it pleases.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. If the House should take a recess until Monday at 10 o'clock, would it not then be in the power of a majority to extend the day of Saturday through Monday?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the motion should prevail and a recess should be taken at the end of this day's proceedings until Monday at 10 o'clock, it would still be in the power of the House to adjourn at any time it pleased between 10 and 12 o'clock on Monday.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the House should adopt this order and take a recess could the House on Monday proceed without adjournment to take up the Post-Office appropriation bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would say it could not.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I inquire what is the effect of this motion if carried? It seems to me that the result, if it has any, is this, that when we adjourn we shall take a recess.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not so understand the motion. The Chair has endeavored to state the question to the House and will state it again. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] moves that at the close of this day's proceedings instead of adjourning the House shall take a recess until 10 o'clock on Monday.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I make a point of order on that motion.

Mr. WILLIS. I withdraw the motion, and now move that at 6 o'clock this day the House shall take a recess until 10 o'clock on Monday morning.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I renew my point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I think the Chair misunderstood me. What I meant to ask the Chair is this: If we take a recess until 10 o'clock on Monday, and when we meet at 10 o'clock we should debate until two minutes past 12 o'clock and then adjourn, would not the adjournment be until Tuesday, so that there would be no Monday as a legislative day?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hardly thinks the question of the gentleman from Kentucky needs an answer.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish to ask the Chair whether this question is not debatable.

Mr. WILLIS. I believe I have got the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is not subject to debate. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] has made a motion, which the Chair has submitted to the House; and, after having submitted it, the Chair is now engaged in answering parliamentary inquiries.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. And this is not debatable?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. REED, of Maine. The motion for a recess, if the Chair please, must be debatable.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair differs from the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Allow me to suggest to the Chair what the state of facts is. We are now dividing on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, that at the close of this day's proceedings the House shall take a recess. The gentleman has withdrawn that motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is aware of that.

Mr. REED, of Maine. The gentleman has now submitted a new motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair agrees.

Mr. REED, of Maine. And the Chair decides that the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky is not debatable.

Mr. PARKER. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, so that the House shall take a recess until 11 o'clock instead of 10 o'clock on Monday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky moves that the House at 6 o'clock this afternoon shall take a recess until 10 o'clock on Monday, to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARKER] moves as an amendment to fix 11 o'clock as the hour to which the recess shall be taken. The question is first on the amendment submitted by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The question being taken, the Speaker pro tempore stated in the judgment of the Chair the ayes had it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I call for a vote.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 132, noes 15.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. No quorum.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BRECKINRIDGE and Mr. WHITE of Kentucky were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 158, noes 6.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. No quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum is found; the ayes have it, and the motion is agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The call is too late. It was not made until after the decision of the Chair was announced.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I submit that the call for the yeas and nays was made instantly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks differently; for the Chair waited very deliberately for the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] to make the demand, and it was not made until after the decision of the Chair was announced.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, it is in order now to call for the yeas and nays, is it not?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] moves that the House now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman as soon as the Chair has stated the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. REED, of Maine. But, Mr. Speaker, I rose to a point of order before that motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] is that the House now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Now, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED, of Maine. But, Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to a point of order regarding this motion, but to a point preceding the motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. REED, of Maine. My point of order is that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] called for the yeas and nays immediately upon the Chair's announcement of the vote, and that that was the only time when he could have called for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not see the point of order. The Chair states that when the report was handed up from the tellers the Chair announced the vote and waited for a call for the yeas and nays to be made. No call having been made, the Chair announced the result, after which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of some importance, and I desire to be heard a little further upon it. After the announcement of the vote by tellers it is in order, I believe, to call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair admits it.

Mr. REED, of Maine. And it is not in order until after the announcement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair admits it.

Mr. REED, of Maine. And immediately after the announcement by the Chair the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] called for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] did not call for the yeas and nays immediately. He——

Mr. REED, of Maine. He could not have made the call until after the announcement by the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Whenever the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] desires it, the Chair will state what occurred.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Precisely.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has stated, and now restates, that when the vote was handed up from the tellers the report showed 158 votes in the affirmative and 6 in the negative; whereupon the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] made the point that no quorum had voted. The Chair replied that a quorum had been found and had voted; and then the Chair waited for a call to be made for the yeas and nays, if any gentleman desired them—waited what the Chair thought was a full and reasonable time. Then, no demand being made for the yeas and nays, the Chair announced that the ayes had it, and that the motion had prevailed; after which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] called for the yeas and nays; which the Chair thought, and then decided and still decides, was too late and not within the rule.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I did not understand such to be the state of facts.

A MEMBER. Such were the facts.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is called for; and it is the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] that this House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, pending that motion I move to reconsider the vote by which the House resolved to take a recess at 6 o'clock this evening until 10 o'clock Monday morning.

Mr. WILLIS. I believe I have the floor, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] to reconsider is in order.

Mr. WILLIS. Then I move to lay it on the table.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken by a rising vote on ordering the yeas and nays, and the motion was not agreed to—only twelve members having risen.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I call for tellers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] asks for tellers upon his demand for the yeas and nays. Gentlemen in favor of ordering tellers will rise and remain standing until counted. [After a pause.] Ten gentlemen have risen—not a sufficient number; so tellers are refused and the yeas and nays are refused.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. WILLIS to lay on the table the motion of Mr. WHITE to reconsider the vote by which the House had ordered a recess to begin at 6 o'clock this evening.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. HAMMOND in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8130) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. PAYNE. I move to amend by inserting after the pending paragraph of the bill the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 140, insert:

"Improving harbor at Pultneyville, N. Y.: For dredging channel and constructing pile pier, $7,500."

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I do not offer this amendment for the purpose of delaying the Committee of the Whole in the consideration of the bill. I have no sympathy with any feeling of that kind which may exist upon this floor. I offer the amendment in the interest of an improvement which I think ought to be made. This harbor at Pultneyville, upon Lake Ontario, is a harbor where the Government in 1870 entered upon the task of improvement. Prior to that time and before the Government had spent a dollar upon the work private parties had expended more than $30,000 for the improvement of this harbor. This showed the feeling of these individuals as to the necessity of this improvement.

Since the Government entered upon this work it has spent $71,000 for the purpose of getting a 10-foot channel. The last appropriation used was in the year 1882. A channel of ten feet was obtained. As a result the commerce of this harbor started up, and from nothing increased to such an extent that the revenues from customs during that year were something like $1,300, as appears by the official report. Since that time, and because the improvement so far as made did not completely remedy the difficulty, sand has drifted into the channel, which now is not more than four feet in depth.

The Committee on Rivers and Harbors refused an appropriation last year because the engineer had made no survey and no appropriation was recommended. This year a survey has been made, and the engineer says that if this pile pier be built and the channel be dredged he believes that ten feet of water can be obtained. He recommends an appropriation of $30,000. I have graded my amendment upon the precise percentage which the committee say they allow. The amendment proposes to expend only 25 per cent. of the $30,000 recommended. I submit that this amendment ought to prevail and that this work on which the Government has expended $71,000 and private individuals $30,000 ought ultimately to be completed and the harbor made navigable for vessels drawing ten feet of water.

Mr. WILLIS. This is not in the estimates at all. The whole number of steamers entering this harbor during the last year was 2; sailing vessels, 17; the total revenues, $453; and the total tonnage 690 tons. It is a harbor of no commercial importance whatever. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. In order to reply to the statement just made, I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I wish to repeat that this work is recommended by the engineer. An appropriation of $30,000 is recommended. The reason the commerce at this harbor has been reduced so that the revenues are less than $500 annually is because sand has drifted into the harbor, and it needs redredging. An expenditure of only $30,000 for this pile pier is necessary to complete the work that the Government has entered upon.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman should understand that the Chief of Engineers has not recommended this work; it is the local engineer.

Mr. PAYNE. The Chief Engineer does recommend it; the recommendation appears at page 324 of the report of the Secretary of War. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. PAYNE, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 38, noes 83.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Raritan Bay, New Jersey: Continuing improvement, $15,000.

Mr. KEAN. I move the following amendment:

Improving harbor at Raritan Bay: For completion of same, $45,000.

Mr. Chairman, I shall detain the Committee of the Whole only a moment for the purpose of calling attention to the vast commerce passing through this channel. The work is almost completed, and with its completion a depth of twenty-one feet of water will be maintained for the whole distance. The whole amount already expended for this improvement has been only $120,000. The sum named in my amendment is required to complete the work. The Chief of Engineers and the engineer in charge not only recommend but earnestly recommend the appropriation.

As stated in the engineer's report—

The annual tonnage of the channel for actual freight is estimated at 2,000,000 tons; it is carried in about 5,000 vessels and steamers, and has an estimated value of $10,000,000 annually.

This tonnage is increasing largely, and if the appropriation now asked be made the work will be completed. This is not an experiment. With this additional appropriation the work will be a success. I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The noes seem to have it.

Mr KEAN. I demand a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 32, noes 64.

Mr. KEAN. No quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN. The point being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint as tellers Mr. WILLIS and Mr. KEAN.

Mr. WILLIS. I hope the gentleman from New Jersey will not insist on his point of no quorum.

Mr. KEAN. I withdraw the point.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

The clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of War is hereby directed to report to the next Congress on the expediency and desirability of continuing the Government improvements of the harbor at Chester, Pa., and the probable expense of repairing the piers now in service there.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I should like to have some explanation in regard to that paragraph.

Mr. EVERHART. Do you want to defeat the paragraph?

Mr. REED, of Maine. No, sir.

Mr. EVERHART. All right, then.

Mr. REAGAN. What is the question before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order unless some amendment be pending.

Mr. WILLIS. I will say to the gentleman from Maine that there is no recommendation made by the engineer, but the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EVERHART] interested in that harbor asked a survey be made for the purpose of ascertaining whether it would be necessary to further improve it. On page 816 of the engineer's report it states:

No work has been performed during the past fiscal year. It is recommended no further appropriation be made for this improvement, and we have made none. The ice-harbor at Marcus Hook, which is very extensive and in a very effective condition, is but two or three miles below, and answers all purposes that a harbor at Chester could demand.

But the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EVERHART] asked further examination should be made to ascertain whether the facts in favor of continuing the Government improvements on the harbor at Chester, Pa., could not be strengthened.

Mr. REED, of Maine. It is not a place where improvements have been going on and stopped by this committee?

Mr. WILLIS. No, sir.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Baltimore, Md.: Continuing improvement, $75,000.

Mr. FINDLAY. I move, in line 173, to strike out $75,000 and insert $200,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in 1853 we had a depth in the ship-channel leading to Baltimore of seventeen feet at mean low water, and by the united effort of the United States, the State of Maryland, and the municipal authorities of the city of Baltimore we have increased that depth to twenty-seven feet. The depth is now sufficient for all practical purposes, but there are three channels leading into the harbor of Baltimore from the deep water of the Chesapeake Bay. There is the channel (I take them in the reverse order) from Fort McHenry to Fort Carroll. Then there is the channel called the Brewerton Channel. Then there is the cut-off which leads to Craighill Channel; and taking the average width of all these channels which are outside of the harbor of Baltimore proper, we have only about two hundred and seventeen feet in width. We want four hundred feet in width and we can not get along without it for obvious reasons. The big steamers which come into that port, some four hundred and forty feet in length, are being continually stranded upon the sides of these channels, and it takes from $2,000 to $3,000 in lighterage, towage, cooperage, and what not to get them off. The bay craft and the seacoast craft that come into that channel, and having the right of way against these steamers, crowd them onto the banks, and this is the result.

We have the testimony of the agents of the board of underwriters and of the pilots of that port. The Chief of Engineers says he can profitably expend in 1886 $200,000, and that $200,000 is only in continuance of the existing project and is absolutely necessary to make it effectual. We have been allowed $75,000 by the committee, but it is not enough, for it makes no difference how deep you make the channel, unless you give it the requisite width it is not sufficient.

I do not propose to go into the general line of argument why we should have this. I shall not allude to the fact that the city of Baltimore has a population of 400,000 souls, or to the other fact that two great trunk lines which lead into the West terminate at that point, and that we have provided the amplest terminal facilities for the accommodation of the Western country as well as of the foreign commerce that comes into that great port of Baltimore.

I will not allude to the further fact, sir, we have helped ourselves in this matter. There has been appropriated about $1,800,000 by the General Government for the improvement of the ship-channels leading into the harbor, and the State of Maryland and the city of Baltimore have come up and appropriated one-third of that amount for the same improvement.

I desire to say further that the city of Baltimore, of all the cities of the Atlantic seacoast, has never received a dollar for the improvement of her harbor proper; all this money has been expended for ship-channels leading into the harbor. The city has given $400,000 for that outer ship-channel. But for the improvement of the harbor itself—for the water ways that are in the harbor—we never received a single dollar from the Government of the United States.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TALBOTT was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. FINDLAY.

Mr. FINDLAY. I am very much obliged to my colleague.

I desire to say here that on a comparison with what has been done or with results that have been reached in the other great cities on the Atlantic seacoast we also hold a most favorable situation. The average approximate width of the channel leading into Boston Harbor is 600 feet; the average width of the New York channel is 1,200 feet; that of Philadelphia 470 feet; while the average width, as I have shown, of the channel of Baltimore is only 217 feet. And although the depth of water in the Baltimore Harbor compares most favorably with the depths of channels leading into other harbors, yet in point of width we do not show so well. For instance, Boston Harbor I think has a depth at high water of 31¾ feet; New York has a depth of 27½ feet at high water; Philadelphia has 26 feet at high water; while Baltimore has 27 feet at mean low water, with 18 inches more as the result of the average rise of the tide, which is increased also by the spring tide.

As I have said, Mr. Chairman, it is not depth, therefore, that we want, but width, for without width depth is good for nothing to meet the demands of the commerce of such a city as Baltimore.

I reserve the remainder of the time allotted to me, in order to hear what may be said in opposition to this amendment by the other side.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, I will call the attention of the committee briefly to a few points which influenced the minds of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in their consideration of the improvement connected with the Baltimore Harbor.

The depth of the channel is now 27 feet. It is correctly stated that there is no trouble about the depth of that channel. The whole question is one of width. This channel averages 250 feet in width in one part, the same in another, 225 feet in another, and for a distance of only a half a mile is it narrowed to 160 feet.

They have on hand enough for this year and for the next fiscal year, being in round numbers $400,000.

Mr. FINDLAY. Oh, no!

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Yes; it so appears in this Book of Estimates.

Mr. FINDLAY. They only have $320,000.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Three hundred and twenty thousand dollars plus $75,000 is $395,000. Of course I spoke in round numbers when I said $400,000.

Mr. FINDLAY. But that is for 1886.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I say for this year and the coming year.

Mr. FINDLAY. I beg pardon; I did not understand that to be your statement.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Now it is estimated by the engineers that they can spend profitably $200,000 in this year. They have got, as I have said, about $400,000 in two years, and in this respect this harbor of Baltimore is in a far better condition than most of her sister cities, which have neither width nor depth, and as it only lacks after this is given $125,000 of what will secure the full completion of the harbor or the completion of the project originally embarked upon, they certainly can not be in a very great state of suffering such as would warrant this increase in the expenditure.

The committee thought, in considering the urgent needs of the commercial interests of this country as involved in this question, that by allowing to Baltimore the sum specified in this bill they had given more than the average allowance of appropriations for works of a similar character generally throughout the country.

Mr. FINDLAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not appreciate altogether the force of that argument. It seems to me that these questions are to be decided not by what has been given to one place or by what has been refused in another, but that each place must be permitted to stand upon its own individual merits.

Now, $1,250,000 was the sum of the original estimate for the completion of this channel improvement in Baltimore. Two hundred thousand dollars yet remain unexpended, or unappropriated, of that original estimate. It is absolutely necessary to complete this great project, so the engineer says, and not merely the Chief Engineer in his report, who says that that amount can be profitably expended in 1886, but the local engineer, Colonel Craighill, says there is a necessity for it. It is true, taking the unexpended balance coming over from 1883 and adding it to the sum appropriated by the last river and harbor bill, that we have $320,000 which is subject to expenditure during the fiscal year 1885. But this appropriation is not for 1885. This appropriation is for 1886; and the Chief of Engineers says that $200,000 can be profitably expended during that year.

I wish now to call the attention of this committee and the attention of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to the fact that during the year 1883–'84—the fiscal year 1884—we expended $240,000 on that work. And I would like to know whether we would not be able to expend profitably the same amount for the year 1886, when the engineer says that $200,000 at least can be profitably expended. In the year terminating the 1st July, 1884, we expended $240,000. Now, if we have $320,000 to expend for the fiscal year 1885, and if we deduct the $240,000 from the $320,000, there are left $80,000 to go over as an unexpended balance; that, added to the $75,000 the committee propose to give us, would be $155,000 for the year 1886. But, sir, we expended $240,000 for the year 1884, and the inference is we could expend at least that amount for the year, 1886.

The question being taken on agreeing to Mr. FINDLAY'S amendment, there were—ayes 40, noes 39.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIS. I of course reserve the right to have a vote on this in the House.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Improving approach to Norfolk Harbor and the United States navy-yard at Norfolk, Va.: Continuing improvement, by widening the channel of Elizabeth River to the port-warden's line on the eastern side, between Lambert's Point Light and Fort Norfolk, commencing at Lambert's Point Light, $50,000.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out from the paragraph just read the following: "By widening the channel of Elizabeth River to the port-warden's line on the eastern side, between Lambert's Point Light and Fort Norfolk, commencing at Lambert's Point Light," and inserting at the end of the paragraph the following: "To be expended under the direction of the Engineer Department."

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. That is simply to leave the expenditure of the appropriation at the discretion of the Engineer Department?

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. There is no objection to that amendment.

Mr. GIBSON. Does it add to the amount in the bill?

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. Not at all.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Improving harbor at Charleston, South Carolina: Continuing improvement, $150,000.

Mr. DIBBLE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 187, strike out "$150,000" and insert "$300,000."

Mr. DIBBLE. Charleston is one of the most important cotton ports on the South Atlantic. It is the largest city on the South Atlantic and Gulf coasts south of Richmond, except the city of New Orleans, and work has been going on at that point which is not local but is national in its importance. By reason of its western connections, Charleston is in communication with Chicago, Cincinnati, Louisville, and Saint Louis for the Western trade to the Southeast Atlantic States. The chambers of commerce of the great city of New York and of our sister city of Baltimore, which has been so fortunately recognized by this House a few moments ago, the Chamber of Commerce of Louisville, Ky., and the Board of Trade and Transportation of Cincinnati, Ohio, have memorialized Congress from time to time to foster and further this improvement as a matter of interest to all those sections of the country.

Now, what is the condition of that work? According to the original project of General Gillmore, one of the best of the Army engineers, that work was to be completed in four years at an annual expenditure of $450,000; and General Gillmore said to the committee that with that amount to expend annually he could construct the works, could secure the works, and could complete the improvement. It has been seven years since that project was submitted. A little over a million of dollars out of the $1,800,000, a little more tha n hlf, has been expended. The engineers ask for $600,000 for the year commencing next July. They have now only the means to carry this work up to the end of the present fiscal year. They want $600,000 for the next year.

The committee have reduced us under an arbitrary scale to 25 per cent. of the estimate. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the importance of this work is exceptional; that it stands as favorably as any project which has been submitted to this Congress, and it ought to be put under the most favorable terms. In this amendment I have only asked for 50 per cent. of the amount the engineers estimated. I ask that the appropriation be raised from $150,000 to $300,000.

There is this additional reason in regard to this improvement: There was estimated in the original project of this work $102,000 for dredging purposes. The time has come when that dredging is necessary; and of this addition of $150,000 fully $100,000 will be needed for that purpose.

The works have to go on. The results at that harbor, as appears by the letter of General Gillmore which was published the other day in the RECORD, show that the work is going to be a success. The people of Charleston have confidence in it. The shipmasters say it is going to give us deep water, and I ask this House that this be made one of those cases where the rule of 25 per cent. shall not be arbitrarily enforced.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE and Mr. HORR rose.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan. Is he in opposition to the amendment?

Mr. HORR. I have but a word to say; but if I recollect this harbor aright it is the one about which we have had so much trouble on the Atlantic coast. Is not this the harbor where the Government, in 1862, sunk from fifteen to twenty ships loaded down? This is the same harbor, is it not?

Mr. DIBBLE. It is the same harbor.

Mr. HORR. Can the gentleman tell us where those ships are?

Mr. DIBBLE. The ships that were sunk at that time have gone down in the quicksands at a point near Pumpkin Hill Channel. But I will say to the gentleman from Michigan, in explanation, that the point where the jetties are located—which jetties have not sunk—has been found by borings made by the engineers to have a solid basis. The place where the ships were sunk is five miles distant from that point.

Mr. HORR. My memory is very clear that the harbor of Charleston is one of the most doubtful improvements in this entire bill, and I think the Committee on Rivers and Harbors have been very liberal with it under all the circumstances of the case; for, if I understand the difficulties there, it is extremely doubtful, with the present engineering and present plan, whether it is not a worse harbor to manage than even Galveston, and I do not want to cast a slur on Galveston by any means. I think that the appropriations for Charleston Harbor up to this time have failed to secure the additional water which we have been told would be obtained. Am I mistaken about that?

Mr. DIBBLE. The gentleman is mistaken about that, in this: the improvement is about three miles long, and the result so far of the improvement from the incomplete works has been to develop deep water about half that distance seaward. The other half has not been developed at all. The movement of deep water seaward is going on day by day, and the report of the last examination shows that it has gone three hundred feet seaward since the previous examination.

Mr. HORR. My memory is still the same. I think the committee have given to this harbor in this bill all that the circumstances and conditions of that harbor will warrant, and if I were to vote for anything with reference to the harbor of Charleston, from the knowledge I have of it, my vote would be not to spend another dollar there until we know a little better what we are getting in return for the money already expended.

That is my idea about it; and I am very clear that it is a conclusion founded upon the reports of engineers and upon ascertained results up to this time. I am sorry, but I say, conscientiously, that I think the money put into Charleston Harbor up to this time has not been profitably spent—that the improvement has not been a success. I appeal to the committee to state if I am not right, and if that is not the information that we have upon this subject. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, Charleston was one of the harbors considered seriously by the committee, with reference to cutting off appropriations entirely, until a complete examination of it could be made by the harbor board provided for in this bill, and a report, giving plans, specifications, and estimates for the final improvement of the harbor, could be submitted to Congress. But, as I said in my extended remarks the other day, the committee concluded that possibly the information they had received at the last session of Congress might not have been correct, and that possibly they were mistaken in their view of the condition of this harbor; and hence it was that a majority of the committee thought it better to allow to this harbor the percentage adopted by the committee in this bill generally, at the same time providing that it should be examined by this harbor board, and a complete report made on the plans and estimates for its improvement. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that the work on Charleston Harbor has not been satisfactory to the committee, and from representations made to the committee at the last session of Congress we have had little hope that the work under the present system will ever prove satisfactory.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. There is at Charleston Harbor an outer bar, and across that bar there are three principal channels, the Beach Channel, the Swash Channel, opposite the center of the harbor, and the Pumpkin Hill Channel, five miles below.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DIBBLE. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to ask if it was not represented to the committee by the gentleman himself at the last session of Congress that the work done there had had the effect of reducing the depth of water in the Pumpkin Hill Channel, which is the best channel, about eighteen inches?

Mr. DIBBLE. About ten inches.

Mr. THOMAS. And is not that the best channel into the harbor—or was it not so represented by the gentleman and his associates at the last session?

Mr. DIBBLE. It is the main ship channel. It was in that channel five miles below that the vessels were sunk to which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] referred a while ago. Now the engineers, in devising a plan for this improvement, took the channel opposite the mouth of the harbor, the Swash Channel, which, with these jetties, has through it a depth of water equal to the average depth of the Pumpkin Hill Channel, the largest channel which Charleston Harbor has had.

Of course the Pumpkin Hill Channel, as the engineers have already reported, will deteriorate in proportion as the central channel improves. Now the central channel has improved to the stage where it is equal in depth to the Pumpkin Hill Channel. But we want money to continue the improvements, because one-half of the space between the two jetties now carries thirty feet of water at low water at places where there was formerly only twelve feet, and the sand which has been carried seaward has not formed a bar outside, but has been dispersed; so that the removal of that sand to the depth of thirty feet has not injured the mouth beyond the jetties or built up a bar there. Within the last twelve months there have been taken, for the purpose of observing the effects of the work that has been done, 40,000 soundings, embracing an area of twenty-five square miles. That is the source from which we get these results. There has been a diver sent down to examine the stability of the jetties, and they have been reported by the engineer as in a satisfactory condition.

Now all I ask is an appropriation which will enable the Government to carry out this project. General Gillmore says:

> I wish to reaffirm my confidence in the ability of these works when completed to maintain a deep navigable channel across the bar. I believe a depth of thirty feet to be easily obtainable.

Now we do not expect to keep Pumpkin Hill Channel open. We expect to make the Swash Channel the channel. Pumpkin Hill is shoaling from day to day. If it continues to shoal and the work upon the other channel is left in this incomplete condition, then it in a measure ...eals the port of Charleston.

Mr. SMALLS. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment offered by my colleague will be adopted. The question has been asked, what became of the ships which were sunk in Charleston Harbor in 1862. My colleague said they went down in the quicksand. They did not go down in the quicksand. I happened to be off that bar about that time. I had something to do around that bar. The main body of those ships were knocked to pieces by the waves and were drifted ashore upon Morris Island, Folly Island, and the rest of the islands along that coast. The bottoms of the ships and the stone in them may have gone down, God knows where.

This channel is now being dug close on to Sullivan's Island beach; and I have been informed by men of experience—such men as General Q. A. Gillmore, who is as high in authority as any man in this country—that the channel over this bar can be improved to a depth of thirty feet. I believe if we give the necessary amount this can be done. I ask the House to give the amount asked for in order that a fair trial may be had.

The trouble is that from time to time there have been appropriations of amounts which were too small, so that just when the work had reached a point where it ought to be prosecuted without delay the appropriations would be exhausted, and the work would be stopped for five or six months till more money could be obtained. In consequence of this method of making insufficient appropriations the channel after work has been done has filled up again so that the work has had to be done over again. This work at Charleston bar has been from time to time commenced anew in this way.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I would like to know what amount of money would give this thirty feet of water that the gentleman speaks of and keep it there.

Mr. SMALLS. I refer the gentleman to the report of that distinguished officer General Gillmore. If he will read that report, he will find just what is needed. [Laughter.]

I hope gentlemen, on this side of the House at least, will give us a chance. If we do not show some improvement, next year cut us off and give us nothing.

A MEMBER. Then what will become of the money that we now appropriate?

Mr. SMALLS. We will take care of that as soon as you appropriate it. There is no trouble about spending the money. [Laughter.] The only trouble in this House is to get it—to prevent gentlemen on the other side from "objecting." Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, for the purpose merely of replying to a question which has been asked, I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. General Gillmore has stated that to make this improvement by jetties, partly submerged and partly high-water jetties, would in his judgment cost $1,800,000. The board of engineers state that the expense for the project as submitted would be $1,800,000. If the jetties were all made high-water jetties, of which the project is capable with the same foundation, the cost would probably be $3,000,000.

Mr. HORR. How much has already been expended there?

Mr. DIBBLE. About $1,000,000.

Mr. HORR. Since when? Since the improvement commenced?

Mr. DIBBLE. In the seven years that the work has been going on. I withdraw the formal amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. DIBBLE, there were—ayes 62, noes 53.

Mr. THOMAS and others. No quorum.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. DIBBLE and Mr. WILLIS were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 53, noes 73.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] withdraw the point of "no quorum?"

Mr. DIBBLE. I did not make the point.

Mr. THOMAS. I made the point; I withdraw it.

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] made the point.

Mr. THOMAS. I also made it.

Mr. ANDERSON. At any rate the point is not insisted upon.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of "no quorum" not being insisted upon, the amendment is rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Improving harbor at Georgetown, S. C.: To complete improvement, $2,000.

Mr. BELFORD. I move to insert after the clause just read the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

> That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to appoint a commission, to consist of three, two of whom shall be members of the Engineer Corps of the Army, and the third one a civilian, to make surveys for the construction of reservoirs on the Poudre, Platte, and Saint Vrain for the storage of surplus water to be used in irrigating and reclaiming the public lands located in the State of Colorado, and to report the probable cost of the construction of such work; and the sum of $20,000 is hereby appropriated to defray the expenses of such commission.

Mr. WILLIS. I make the point of order——

Mr. BELFORD. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I hope not.

Mr. WILLIS. I regret I am compelled to make it, but I do so in the interest of public business.

Mr. BELFORD. All right; but I propose to be heard on that point of order.

Mr. WILLIS. It has been acted on.

Mr. BELFORD. No, it has not been acted on at all; it was withdrawn by consent. I say that the Chair, when he comes to understand this question as I desire to present it, will correct his former ruling on this subject; and I am going to demonstrate it by the character of this bill; and that is the question on which I desire the Chair to hear me.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to hear the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. BELFORD. Very well. Now, Mr. Chairman, this is a proposition to construct reservoirs to preserve the water in the Western rivers in order to reclaim the public land. That is the subject-matter. Will the gentleman from Kentucky tell me if I offer an amendment to widen the channel of the Ohio River at Saint Louis that it would be out of order? Would he have the courage and the audacity—I hate to use that word because he is such an elegant gentleman—would he have the courage to stand up on the floor of this House and say that an amendment of that character was out of order? Suppose some gentleman stood up in his place and offered an amendment to this bill providing we should establish jetties in the Mississippi River in order to deepen the channel in the center of that stream, is there a gentleman here who would stand up and say that that proposition was out of order? If a gentleman comes here and says we should appropriate so much money to deepen the channel of a river, who will say that is not in order? Suppose some gentleman comes here with a proposition to diminish the caving in of the banks of a stream, who will not say that is not in order? Now, what is my proposition? It is simply to preserve the surplus water of these rivers in Colorado in order that we may reclaim over 700,000,000 acres of the public domain held by the Republic in trust for everybody.

I wish to call the gentleman's attention—Brother WILLIS, will you please give me your attention. [Great laughter.]

Mr. WILLIS. With pleasure, if the gentleman will help me to pass this bill.

Mr. BELFORD. I call the attention of the Chair to page 38 of this bill, commencing with line 902. Oh! it is in order for you fellows down South to have the water flow through your baskets, but it is not in order for us to get any pork in our pot out West. [Renewed laughter.]

I wish you to answer this question as chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. My proposition is to construct reservoirs to save the surplus water in Colorado. Now what has the gentleman done? He has been chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors for two years. What did you report in the last bill and what do you report in this? "For continuing operations on the reservoirs at the headwaters of the Mississippi River, $35,000." Did you raise the point of order when you incorporated that into the body of your bill? What do you want these reservoirs for at the headwaters of the Mississippi River except that it may run down to the South?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE rose.

Mr. BELFORD. The gentleman will pardon me, but I have no time to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado is speaking by consent of the Chair, and the Chair is ready to rule on the point of order.

Mr. BELFORD. I wish to present my point before the Chair rules.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be glad to have the gentleman do so.

Mr. BELFORD. But I will hear my friend from Kentucky.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. The gentleman speaks of reservoirs. Have those he refers to any connection with navigation?

Mr. BELFORD. I do not know but we may get water enough there to navigate a vessel. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I have asked my friend a plain question.

Mr. WILLIS. It is irrigation vs. navigation.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I ask the gentleman the plain question whether these reservoirs he refers to have anything to do with commerce?

Mr. BELFORD. They have an important connection with commerce. You have got, as I said a moment ago, 700,000,000 acres of unoccupied public land west of the one hundredth meridian. Oh! the gentleman may smile—he will not smile when he gets as old as I am. [Laughter.]

Now, what is commerce? It is nothing but the product of population. What is produced by human hands—what is produced by human brains—that is commerce.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hopes the gentleman will keep to the point of order.

Mr. BELFORD. I have been trying to keep to it as close as I could.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides the point of order to be well taken; and rules the amendment out.

Mr. BELFORD. Then I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. BELFORD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am coming to another branch of this question. Here is my own State that contributes millions of dollars to spread out the purse of the national revenue. I come here and ask you gentlemen to give us $500,000 to improve our streams, to reclaim our deserts, to make them blossom as the rose, and you will not give us a cent. We have not a single nickel in this bill. [Laughter.]

Now, let me tell you where the pork is circulated in this measure, and I must hurry through, as I want to keep inside of my five minutes. Maine, the little Pine-Tree State of Maine, that is represented by a gentleman of brains who is larger than the whole State [laughter]—and I make no personal allusion—gets $67,000.

New Hampshire—and I do not know whether they have got a harbor up there in that part of the country or not—gets $22,500. Massachusetts, $276,000—that belongs to the pork-and-beans section of the country. [Laughter.] Vermont gets $20,000. Rhode Island, about which my friend SPOONER made a magnificent speech yesterday, or the day before—you get $50,000 of the general swag.

Mr. SPOONER. And we are entitled to a great deal more.

Mr. BELFORD. Connecticut gets $138,000. North Carolina, with the largest seacoast border in this country—they cut that State down—and they get, I think, $112,000. South Carolina, $179,000; Georgia, $140,000; Louisiana, $279,000; Texas, larger than the whole Republic of France—yes, you could chuck the whole Republic of France into the State of Texas and it would not create a ripple on the surface [laughter]—Texas gets $1,112,500. And outside of this statement I challenge any gentleman to show notwithstanding the fact that Colorado pours into your Treasury every year millions of dollars and has done so from the time she came into this constellation of States, gleaming with the burning beauty of the beams of the sky—you never appropriated over $60,000 for her benefit. Hold on to that gavel for a moment. [Laughter.] We are fit objects for public robbery, but you are not willing to give us a cent to build up a million of homes for a million of poor families in the West, homes of men who will make your spindles turn, men who will construct your railroads, men who will transport the commerce of the country, and who by their money and labor and resources have enriched and are enriching this nation—you are not willing to give us a penny. Take your bill and pass it if you can. [Laughter, and cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving the harbor at Brunswick, Ga.: Continuing improvement, $18,000.

Mr. NICHOLLS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in line 192, the word "eighteen" and insert "twenty-five;" so that it will read:

"Continuing improvement, $25,000."

Mr. NICHOLLS. This harbor of Brunswick, Mr. Chairman, is a very important harbor, one of the most important on the coast, not only to the commerce of that State, but to the commerce of the West. The appropriations have been very small in the past. I read from the report of the Chief of Engineers:

The first appropriation of 1836 was for the removal of the Brunswick Bar, and was so expended.

In 1879, the date of the next appropriation, there was only nine feet of water at low tide over the bar at the entrance of the harbor. The improvement since commenced and still in progress had resulted in June, 1882, in establishing a channel from forty to fifty feet in width, with a minimum depth of about thirteen feet at low water, and has benefited commerce by increasing the depth over the bar.

The present plan contemplates a depth of fifteen feet at low tide over the bar.

It will be seen, Mr. Chairman, by an examination of this report, that the amount appropriated by the act of August 2, 1882, was $25,000. On July 1, 1882, the outstanding liabilities, inclusive of the amount expended, was $24,502; and on the 1st of July, 1883, the amount available was only $498.90.

Now, I only ask for an increase of $7,000, and I think it is important to increase the appropriation at that point.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 26, noes 47.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Savannah: Continuing improvement, $85,000.

Mr. NICHOLLS. I move to amend, in line 196, by striking out "$85,000" and inserting "$200,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia.

The amendment was read by the Clerk.

Mr. NICHOLLS. Now, there can be no doubt in the minds of any one who is at all familiar with the international and national importance of the port of Savannah as to the propriety of this amendment. The appropriation of $85,000 amounts to nothing, since that amount will not accomplish any material results, and they had just as well not appropriate one dollar, because about as fast as the work is done on such meager appropriations it is destroyed for lack of money to prosecute it vigorously. We really need there a large appropriation for purposes which I will specify. We should have, for instance, an increase of the appropriation to enable the construction of a large and powerful dredge-boat, at a cost of about $100,000, to be used on the bar at Savannah, in Charleston Harbor, in Brunswick, and on the Saint John's Bar. The construction of such a boat would enable the work to be carried on a great deal more rapidly than it is possible to do it now.

I desire to have read a letter from the chairman of the river and harbor committee of the council of the city of Savannah, showing the great necessity for an increase of the appropriation to that harbor.

The Clerk read as follows:

CITY OF SAVANNAH, MAYOR'S OFFICE,
Savannah, Ga., January 31, 1885.

DEAR SIR: As chairman of the harbor and river committee of the council of the city of Savannah, I beg most respectfully to call your attention to the proposed appropriation of only $85,000 for the improvements in the Savannah River, and to request that you will exert your influence for the increase of this amount, which is so inadequate for the successful prosecution of the work already begun.

In the present incomplete condition of these improvements the channel, of necessity, is shifting continually, which causes frequent grounding of vessels, thus greatly obstructing commerce and entailing expense by delay, and often of lighterage. This shifting, of course, can be remedied only by the completion of the improvements, and you will appreciate at once of what vital importance this completion is, not only to the city of Savannah, but also to the State at large; and to secure this most needed result an appropriation for the coming year of at least $200,000 is required. The commercial interests of the entire State would suffer if the rapid and vigorous prosecution of this most important work should have to stop from any cause, and especially when that cause is the failure of Congress to make a sufficiently large appropriation.

Bespeaking for this matter a continuance of that interest and influence which you always have shown and exerted in matters of such vital importance to the city of Savannah, and which are so intimately connected with the welfare of the State,

I am, dear sir, respectfully, yours,

ROBT. D. BOGART,
Chairman Committee on Harbor and River.

Hon. JOHN C. NICHOLLS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. NICHOLLS. I now ask that the report of the Chief of Engineers be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SAVANNAH RIVER AND HARBOR, GEORGIA (page 134).

The appropriations between 1826 and 1855, inclusive, were chiefly applied to the removal of wrecks sunk in the channel-way of the river below Savannah during the Revolutionary war; to dredging shoals produced by them and at other points, and in constructing works designed to throw a large volume of water into "Front River." The result was an increase of depth at the worst places of from seven or eight feet at low water to ten feet, and an increase of the available high-water depth, from Tybee Roads to the city, from about fourteen to sixteen or seventeen feet.

The channel-way of the river below the city greatly deteriorated during the civil war, in consequence of numerous and extensive obstructions placed in it. The first three appropriations since 1872 were almost exclusively used in removing those portions of the obstructions most injurious to navigation, and to that extent commerce was benefited by the work.

The expenditures since 1874 have resulted in forming a practical ship-channel from Tybee Roads to the city of Savannah, by which about thirteen feet at low water and nineteen feet at high water can now be carried to the city.

Under the existing plan it is expected that at its completion vessels drawing twenty-two feet will be able to reach the city wharves.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I move to strike out the last word, and yield my time to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. NICHOLLS].

Mr. WILLIS. I hope the gentleman will not occupy more time but will let us have a vote.

Mr. NICHOLLS. I have only a word to add. The chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors seems to be very uneasy about the time to be occupied. More has been saved to the country by the member who now addresses this committee, in not occupying the public time upon this floor as much as other gentlemen have, than perhaps the whole amount I ask to be appropriated for this important work. It is very rarely that I am on the floor taking up the time of the country by addressing the House or the Committee of the Whole on any subject of this character. But I feel very much in earnest about this. It is a very important work, as I remarked at the outset, and the small appropriation made by this committee for that important harbor, it occurs to me, would be like throwing the money into the river instead of expending it for improvements. We ought to expend a sufficient sum on these harbors, the amount asked by the engineers, and complete the work and be done with it. Why go on from year to year and appropriate inadequate amounts and accomplish no good result? When a work of this important character is brought to the attention of the House, why not make a sufficient appropriation to accomplish some good?

The question being taken on the amendment offered by Mr. NICHOLLS, there were—ayes 23, noes 49.

Mr. NICHOLLS. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted, the Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. NICHOLLS, and the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. WILLIS.

Mr. NICHOLLS. I will not delay the bill, and do not insist on a vote by tellers.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Improving Tampa Bay, Florida: Continuing improvement, $10,000.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 200 strike out "$10,000" and insert "$37,000."

Mr. DAVIDSON. I favor the passage of a river and harbor bill at the present session and at every session of Congress. I believe, sir, that a liberal and judicious expenditure of money for the improvement of our rivers and harbors is right; that it helps the laborer, benefits commerce, and improves the general welfare of our country. Therefore, sir, in offering this amendment I was prompted by no desire to delay action upon this bill, but simply by a sense of duty.

The town of Tampa, on Tampa Bay, is about two hundred and fifty miles from Key West and three hundred and fifty miles from Havana. Within the last three years it has greatly improved in population and commerce. It is now the terminus of one railroad connecting it with the Saint John's River at Sanford, and it will soon be the terminus of another connecting it by rail with Jacksonville. It is situated immediately on the line of travel from the United States to Cuba and the Central American and South American States, and before this year ends no doubt the mails from our country will be carried through Tampa to Havana.

This work was commenced about four years since. Forty thousand dollars have been expended. A great good has resulted from that expenditure. The engineers report that $37,000 can be profitably expended during the next fiscal year, and that amount will complete the work.

A few days since I received a paper signed by many of the leading citizens of Tampa, addressed to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Florida, urging them to appeal to Congress at its present session to make the necessary appropriation to complete the work at that place. If the committee will bear with me, I will read a few extracts from this paper. It came too late to be referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors before they had agreed upon their bill:

Tampa is now the terminus of the longest and most successful system of railroads reaching the Gulf of Mexico. Its line of road, of which it is the terminus, is to be speedily connected to other systems of railroad; and other individual lines of railroads are being built to this city. It has thus been chosen by skillful, competent, and far-seeing engineers and capitalists as a natural outlet to the Gulf of Mexico.

We earnestly ask you to recognize the importance of the position of the town of Tampa, with its bay and harbor, its railroad and terminal possessions, its direct and continuous connection with all great Northern, Eastern, and Western States and cities by railroad, and its safe and close position to the Island of Cuba, South America, and West Indies—being the most southern seaport town with railroad service open (with but little improvement to its channel)—to the vast trade, export and import, of Cuba and West Indies, also South America

We wish particularly to call to your attention the useless work accomplished by small appropriations, that ere the work is commenced the appropriation is expended, and even with what has been appropriated and expended our shipping to Cuba, South America, Key West, West Indies, and New Orleans, is seriously impeded by lack of water in our channel and obstructions needing removal.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLIS. I ask for a vote.

The question being taken on Mr. DAVIDSON'S amendment, there were—ayes 19, noes 43.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "dollars," in line 200, insert:
"Improving harbor at Pensacola, Fla., including outer and inner bars, $100,000."

Mr. DAVIDSON. I regret to occupy the time of the committee, but I am prompted by a sense of duty to offer this amendment. The importance of the harbor of Pensacola, and the necessity for an appropriation to improve it, have induced me to offer this amendment. I can tell this committee that if our country desires a deep-water outlet on the Gulf of Mexico for its agricultural products and the products of its manufacturers, a safe and convenient port, a spacious anchorage for vessels, Pensacola is that port. Sir, it is a port of importance; it is growing in importance, and it is already a place of far more importance than many members of this committee probably think it is. For the year ending June 30, 1883, the value of the exports from Pensacola was $2,598,549; for the year ending June 30, 1884, the value of the exports was $3,025,246. The number of vessels entering and leaving the port of Pensacola during the year ending June 30, 1883, was 1,111, of which 685 were foreign vessels; and for the year ending June 30, 1884, the number of vessels was 1,184, of which 777 were foreign vessels. The aggregate tonnage for the year ending June 30, 1884, was 698,851 tons.

Now, sir, I shall have to occupy a few moments in reading some extracts from the report made by Assistant Engineer Hayes to Captain

Hoxie, of the Corps of Engineers. I read from the report of the preliminary examination:

"The preliminary examination of the "outer bar," reported to Maj. A. N. Damrell, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, July 15, 1884, shows the distance across it, between the 25-foot curves, to be 3,000 feet; the minimum depth upon the crest of the bar to be 22.25 feet at mean low water, and the amount of excavation required to cut a channel across it 300 feet wide, affording a depth of 24 feet at mean low water, or the same depth as is contemplated for the channel across the "inner bar," is estimated to be 80,000 cubic yards. This work is more exposed than that on the "inner bar," and will cost about $100,000 for its execution.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Mr. Chairman, while I am aware that it probably will not accomplish any good at the present time, I will, with the permission of the House, print with my remarks extracts from the report of this preliminary examination. The following are the extracts:

The commercial statistics of the port of Pensacola for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, exhibits the present extent and importance of its foreign and domestic commerce. It will be observed that the tonnage of sailing vessels entering this port exceeds that of any port on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts between Philadelphia and the Rio Grande, including Baltimore and New Orleans. * * * The largest cargoes of lumber and timber ever shipped by steamers or sailing vessels from any Southern port have sailed from Pensacola since the 1st of July, 1884.

As the site of one of the largest and best appointed naval stations of the country, Pensacola Harbor possesses consequence as an important position for naval operations in the Gulf of Mexico. Its geographical position relatively to the commerce of the Gulf; its proximity to resources which form the material of war as well as of commerce, to the development of which so wonderful a momentum is now being imparted; the removal of a great barrier to the commerce of Europe and America with the Pacific by the construction of the Isthmus Canal; the rapid extension of the network of railways in the Gulf States, of which Pensacola is an important terminus, developing the capacity of production of agricultural values, mining and manufacturing resources of these States, will at no remote period give test to the capacities and advantages of every Gulf port which will give prominent significance to this harbor.

The question was taken on the amendment offered by Mr DAVIDSON, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Mr. Chairman, as I have already said, I dislike exceedingly to occupy the time of the committee; but representing as I do a district which has more seacoast than any other in the Union, I feel it my duty to offer another amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

After line 200 insert:
"Improving the harbor of Cedar Keys, Fla.: Continuing improvement, $10,000."

Mr. DAVIDSON. Upon that amendment, Mr. Chairman, I have this to say: At the last session of Congress the Committee on Rivers and Harbors recommended an appropriation of $5,000 to commence the work on the harbor of Cedar Keys. In this bill there is no provision made for that harbor. The engineer, speaking of this harbor, says:

In my judgment, the harbor of Cedar Keys is worthy of improvement, and a work of public necessity, on account of the large and rapidly increasing commerce of the port, and the small expenditure, relatively, probably necessary to give the relief sought.

He further says that $25,000 will be sufficient to complete the work. I repeat that $5,000 was recommended for this harbor by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in the last bill, and the recommendation was agreed to, and now by this amendment I ask only for $10,000 more to carry on the work.

The question was taken on the amendment offered by Mr. DAVIDSON, and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the next paragraph of the bill, as follows:

Improving harbor at Mobile, Ala.: Continuing improvement, $120,000.

Mr. DUNHAM. Mr. Chairman, I wish some gentleman of the committee would explain how it happens that Mobile is given an appropriation 50 per cent. larger relatively than is usually given by this bill to other harbors throughout the country.

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. It is because the necessity of that place required it in the judgment of the committee. [Laughter].

Mr. HORR. Can the gentleman tell us what the exigency was which caused the committee to recommend an appropriation for Mobile of 50 per cent. of the estimate when they have allowed only 25 per cent. to similar harbors all over the country?

Mr. JONES. The committee have allowed more than 25 per cent. of the estimates to different harbors throughout the country. A number of such have been mentioned. Detroit River, in the gentleman's own State, gets 100 per cent. of the estimate; the Ohio River gets $370,000 on an estimate of $600,000—over 50 per cent.; New London gets 66 per cent.

Mr. HORR. The Detroit River appropriation is to complete a rock channel at the Lime Kilns, which is almost completed. This little balance of $27,000 finishes it.

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. Yes, sir.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, what is the question before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. There is no motion pending.

Mr. TURNER. I call for the regular order.

Mr. HORR. I move to strike out the last words of the paragraph. I would like to know why the gentleman [Mr. JONES, of Alabama] takes an extreme case like the Detroit River appropriation, where the engineers estimate that $27,000 will complete the work—a river that has upon it a commerce of $40,000,000.

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. The estimate of the board of engineers is $240,000 as the sum that will complete the Mobile improvement, which was estimated originally to cost $820,000. The committee was influenced to give one-half of the amount of the estimate in order that the next appropriation might complete the work, as the Detroit River work is to be completed.

Mr. HORR. Who influenced them?

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. Why, they were influenced by a consideration of everything connected with the case.

Mr. HORR. Oh, you did not mean they were influenced by any particular person. I know I could not get into the room of the committee to influence them, though I tried to. [Laughter.]

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. Now, sir, this harbor of Mobile is quite different, in regard to the nature of the work, from all the other harbors on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts. In every other one of them the material to be dealt with in making harbor improvements is sand, and the work done on them is very unsatisfactory; but at Mobile the material is blue mud, and the work there is reported by engineers to be permanent.

Mr. HORR. Then, wherever it is blue mud the committee allowed one-half the estimate. [Laughter.]

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. Where the improvement was likely to be permanent. A large experimental cut twenty-two feet deep, one hundred feet wide, and three hundred feet long was made at Mobile in 1882, and it has been found that there is no shoaling and the work is permanent; hence the engineer in charge feels warranted in reporting and does report that the dredging done and to be done there will be permanent. No work done at any other harbor from Old Point Comfort to the Rio Grande is so satisfactory.

Now I will read what the engineer in charge of this work says about it:

As the early completion of the channel as projected, and also its comparative permanency, is now believed by the commercial portion of this port to be a certainty, business and commerce have assumed a healthy condition, realty has increased in value, new industries are springing up, new companies forming, not only in Mobile, but with wonderful rapidity throughout the vast mineral and timber portions of Alabama and adjacent States—

A MEMBER. What is the commerce?

Mr. JONES, of Alabama (reading)—

The amount of shipping of 1883 and 1884 is about 40 per cent. greater in number than that of 1881 and 1882, while the tonnage is about 54 per cent. increase, showing a much larger class of vessels now seeking this port.

Mr. HORR. Now, as I understand, there are about two hundred or two hundred and fifty ships going into Mobile in the course of a year. On the river I spoke of in Michigan there are at least six hundred—I think it would be safe to say nine hundred; but I will say six hundred. Why do you cut down——

Mr. HERBERT. There has been an increase of tonnage at Mobile since this work began—a very great increase the present season.

Mr. HORR. Well, there ought to be an increase.

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. The increase is on account of this improvement there.

Mr. HORR. I do not find any fault with the improvement at Mobile; but the treatment of Mobile in comparison with some other localities does not seem to me to be fair, that is all.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I take the floor simply for the purpose of answering the inquiry why 50 per cent. of the estimate has been given by the committee at this place rather than 25 per cent., as in other instances.

A MEMBER (to Mr. THOMAS). If you answer that you will do well.

Mr. THOMAS. I will give what I think should be accepted as a complete answer. The representative on the committee from that State urged upon the committee the importance of this improvement over every other in the State, saying he was willing, and it was acceptable to the residue of the delegation from the State, that the appropriations for other improvements in the State should be less in order that this one grand improvement should be carried forward to completion. That has governed the action of the committee, and although 50 per cent. of the estimate is allowed in this instance, the appropriations for the other projects in the State are cut down to less than 25 per cent. This is a straightforward statement of the reason why 50 per cent. has been given in this instance instead of 25.

Mr. DUNHAM. Mr. Chairman, I had no desire to disturb the committee on this question; but in examining this bill together with the engineer's estimates, I discovered that the bill gave to Mobile 50 per cent. of the estimate, which was larger in proportion than the amount allowed to any other harbor thus far reached in this bill. My desire in asking the question was simply that this fact might be explained and that we might understand the reason of this apparent discrimination. I must say, however, even after what the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. JONES] has stated, that, judging from the amount of commerce going into that harbor, I can not see any real necessity for giving Mobile more in proportion than any other harbor in the United States.

Mr. BLANCHARD obtained the floor.

Mr. HORR. Before the gentleman proceeds I wish to correct a statement which I made a moment ago. I said that probably six hundred vessels went into the Saginaw River in the course of a year. I find the actual number is over 2,000, against two hundred or a little more at Mobile.

Mr. BLANCHARD. In further explanation of the action of the committee in regard to Mobile Harbor, I will state that the original project of the engineer was to obtain a channel in that bay two hundred feet wide and seventeen feet deep. The money heretofore expended has been used in deepening that harbor to the depth of seventeen feet, but the width of the channel is only one hundred feet.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Seventy-five feet.

Mr. BLANCHARD. It was seventy-five feet, but has been increased twenty-five feet, making one hundred feet. Now, that is not a sufficient width to do any good with a depth of seventeen feet. The committee thought it would be right to give enough money to widen this channel in Mobile Bay to two hundred feet, so as to render it available for commerce, and to make a corresponding reduction upon works in other parts of the State.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. That channel is twenty-six miles long. Consequently it takes a good deal of money to make a cut.

Mr. HERBERT. Mobile has the largest watershed, I believe, anywhere east of the Mississippi. It is the natural port of the Gulf of Mexico. As soon as the work is completed it will be a more desirable harbor than New Orleans. Every dollar that is put in there is valuable. Every bucketful or basketful of earth taken out of that harbor makes it exactly that much deeper, because, as has been said by my colleague, the bottom of that bay is blue mud, or, rather, a hard sort of clay, and money invested there pays more in actual results than anywhere else. The natural flow of the current tends to wash the channel deeper instead of to fill it up, as in other places.

I was told by the Government engineer that an old British chart made a hundred years ago shows that on the bay the water was then one foot shallower than it is now. This confirms his opinion that the natural action of the current is to wash the channel deeper. But the clay is too hard; it washes too slowly. It must be taken out by the dredge, and then Mobile will become, what by its position on the Gulf and its proximity to coal and iron it is entitled to be, a great manufacturing and commercial city.

One word as to why this 50 per cent. is given here. In the last appropriation bill my recollection is that Mobile got $200,000. Considering the importance of that port relatively to others that was not too much. The engineers have since reported that to complete the work according to the present plan only $240,000 was necessary. That really ought to have been all appropriated at once. But suppose you go to work at this sum on the 25 per cent. rule, giving only 25 per cent. of what the engineers recommend each year. You will never get through with appropriating that needed $240,000—needed to make a channel one hundred feet wide and seventeen feet deep.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HERBERT. Fifty per cent. of that $240,000 is only $120,000.

[Here the hammer fell.]

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Chair will regard the pro forma amendments of the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from Alabama as withdrawn.

The amendments were withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at New Orleans, La.: Continuing improvements, $150,000, to be expended under the jurisdiction of the Mississippi River Commission.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 205, after the word "dollars," insert "and for the improvement and preservation of the harbor at Hickman, Ky., $50,000."

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to trespass upon the time or the patience of this committee. I have but five minutes of time, and I can not do justice to the subject in that brief space. I rise, however, to call the attention of this committee to a few points in connection with this Mississippi River improvement.

In the last river and harbor appropriation bill there was embraced in the Mississippi River improvement, specifically named, the harbors at New Orleans, Natchez, Vicksburg, Memphis, Hickman, and at Columbus. In the present bill the Committee on Rivers and Harbors have stricken out every harbor on the river named in the last bill which passed except New Orleans. They have stricken out Natchez, Vicksburg, Greenville, Memphis, Hickman, and Columbus. Why this has been done I can not imagine; certainly for no just reason.

Now, sir, I say that it is not fair and just to the other harbors and points of importance on this river, and which have heretofore been uniformly embraced in the river and harbor bill. It is not fair to these harbors and to the great commercial interest of the West and South.

The harbor of Hickman is the terminus of the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad, a railroad extending to the East and connecting with the roads running throughout the whole Southeastern States and terminating at Hickman, Ky. All the commerce of a great region of country is brought to the river by that line of road at Hickman. This harbor is a very important point, and has been considered important by this very committee, as may be inferred from the fact that it was embraced in the last annual river and harbor appropriation bill, which passed this House at the last session. In addition I desire to say that the Mississippi River Commission have recommended in their last report an appropriation for the harbor at Hickman of more than double the amount proposed by my amendment.

Mr. GIBSON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. No, sir; I do not yield now. The gentleman can occupy his own time. I have not the time to spare. I desire to state that after the river and harbor bill passed at the last session of Congress, the president of the Mississippi River Commission made no improvements whatever at Hickman or Columbus; and in response to a communication from the mayor and city council, as I am informed, stated that he had no money, or that the fund appropriated was not sufficient to make improvements there. Now, however, he specifies the amount that is necessary for that harbor, but the committee have left it out. They strike out every harbor on the river except New Orleans. I trust the amendment will be adopted, that the harbor may be preserved, for the bank of the river at Hickman is rapidly falling in and the harbor will be destroyed.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will state to my friend from Kentucky that the Mississippi River Commission which is charged with the important duty of the improvement of the Mississippi River from the Des Moines Rapids to its mouth made separate estimates for all of these harbors, and said in their report that if appropriations were made for any of the harbors on the river that they should be made separately, granting so much for each.

Now, when the Committee on Rivers and Harbors came to consider the question of these harbors they came to the conclusion that New Orleans, being a great seaport, the second in importance in the United States in point of commerce and the amount of shipping and the value of its exports—that they would make an appropriation for that harbor, the estimate for it being $700,000. We appropriated of that amount only $150,000.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I desire to say to my friend from Louisiana that I do not want to be understood as antagonizing the appropriation at New Orleans by any means.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I agree the gentleman did not antagonize it, but he asks why is it that appropriation is made by this committee for New Orleans when it is denied to Hickman, Ky. I state in response to his inquiry that it was because the committee recognized New Orleans as a great seaport, while Hickman, Ky., can not claim that dignity as a harbor.

Mr. HUNT. Will the gentleman from Kentucky allow a question?

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I believe my time has expired.

Mr. HUNT. I would like to have the gentleman state whether he ever voted for a river and harbor bill during his service in Congress.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I have to reply that the question of the gentleman has nothing whatever to do with the question before the committee now, and at the proper time I will answer it.

Mr. HUNT. You decline to answer it?

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I will answer at a proper time, when I have time——

Mr. HUNT. It is stated to me that you never have, and yet you want the committee to do that which you have never been willing to do yourself.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. The records of this House will show my votes in regard to the river and harbor appropriation bills since I have been a member of this House; and if the gentleman from Louisiana will take the trouble to examine for himself, he will know just what my views are and how I voted, for I have expressed my views on river and harbor bills repeatedly in this House and they are to be found in the record, and I stand by the views that I have expressed in regard to river and harbor bills. I have always favored the improvement of navigable rivers that would benefit commerce.

Mr. YOUNG addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana is entitled to the floor if he chooses to occupy it in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. YOUNG. I seek recognition to ask a question of my friend from Louisiana, whether or not the appropriation recommended by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors for New Orleans is for the "landing" or for the "harbor?"

Mr. HUNT. I will answer the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. YOUNG. Very well, I would like to have an answer.

Mr. BLANCHARD. It is for the harbor of New Orleans.

Mr. YOUNG. I want to know the particular point where the appropriation is to be disbursed; whether at the river landing or at the mouth of the Mississippi River.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The mouth of the Mississippi River is one hundred and thirteen miles from New Orleans, and this appropriation has got nothing to do with the mouth of the river. The harbor of New Orleans itself is about two and a half miles long——

Mr. HUNT. The city has a front of eleven miles.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Then it extends eleven miles along the Mississippi River, and this appropriation is for the harbor of New Orleans.

Mr. YOUNG. Then, if I understand it, it is an appropriation for a river front like Hickman, Memphis, and Vicksburg. But I am not antagonizing it.

Mr. HUNT. Then you are for it.

Mr. YOUNG. I do not know why I should not be. I withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TURNER].

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 205, after the word "dollars," insert:

"And for the improvement and preservation of the harbor at Columbus, Ky., $50,000."

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. In addition to what I have just said upon the amendment which has been voted down by this committee, in accordance I suppose with the rule which has controlled the committee, or at any rate those having appropriations in the bill to vote down all amendments, I simply desire to state this: That Columbus is the terminus of the Mobile and Ohio Railroad, a railroad running from the Gulf of Mexico and terminating at Columbus, Ky., connecting it with all the railroads through the Southern and Southeastern States. In addition to that it is the terminus of the Iron Mountain Railroad, running from Saint Louis on the opposite side of the river; the connection is made there. The amount of the commerce is immense that is transported to that point, the river is caving in, the harbor is being almost destroyed, and it is just as much entitled to an appropriation as New Orleans or any other harbor on the river.

In addition to that, let me say that the question was investigated at the last session of Congress, and after mature and deliberate consideration Columbus was included among the harbors to be put in the last river and harbor bill, and the provision for that harbor passed the House of Representatives and the Senate and became the law. No improvement was made, because the president of the Mississippi River Commission said he had not funds to make the appropriation. He has now given his estimate, and says it would take $80,000. I have only asked in the amendment for $50,000. I think it is a proper amendment and ought to be adopted.

Mr. BAYNE. I want to say a word. I have not detained the committee hitherto because I want to get the bill through the House.

There are seven or eight places reported here as harbors and called harbors on the Mississippi River. They have no more right to be called harbors than any point on any navigable river in the country. They are merely landings.

The criticism of the gentleman from Kentucky on the New Orleans appropriation is a just criticism. The $150,000 voted for the so-called harbor at New Orleans ought not to be in this bill. No appropriation should be made for New Orleans, Memphis, Vicksburg, Natchez, Greenville, Hickman, or Columbus or for Cairo. If you adopt the principle that all the landings along the navigable rivers and lakes of this country are to be called harbors and that a separate and distinct appropriation is to be made for each, you will require a harbor bill which will run into hundreds of millions of dollars. That is what this whole thing means. The whole thing ought to be stricken out. It was, as to all points except New Orleans, but the persistence of my friend from New Orleans that secured that appropriation.

Mr. BLANCHARD. May I ask my friend from Pennsylvania a question? Did he not vote for it in the committee?

Mr. BAYNE. I acceded to it when I understood there was no use of fighting it, and I have not opposed it here.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I desire to reply to the remark of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question. [Cries of "Vote!" Vote!"]

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of surprise to my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE]. Now, sir, what is a harbor? Here is the last river and harbor bill. What constitutes in this bill harbors on the Mississippi River? They are points for the landing of boats for the purpose of receiving freight which is brought to the river by the railroads which permeate the interior of the country.

My friend from Pennsylvania has been on the River and Harbor Committee for years in this House. Every river and harbor bill that has passed this House since I have had the honor of being a member on the floor has embraced specifically, by name, the harbors on the Mississippi River—New Orleans, Greenville, Vicksburg, Natchez, Memphis, and at the last session Congress put in Hickman and Columbus as important harbors, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania has voted for every one of them, and voted for the last bill. He is the last man that has the right to come upon this floor and proclaim at this late day that these important points are mere landings and not harbors. The gentleman's argument that you might embrace every landing on the Mississippi River and on other rivers amounts to nothing. Congress would not be guilty of such folly, but have properly embraced important termini of great railroads, and Hickman and Columbus are two of them—heretofore properly included.

It is a matter for the sound discretion of Congress, and it is presumed that they will exercise a sound discretion. There are but few points on the Mississippi River that are reached by important lines of railroad. Hickman and Columbus are two of them, Memphis is another, and all these are important harbors, which have been embraced in every river and harbor bill, and ought not at this late day to be left without provision for their improvement while everything is given to the city of New Orleans. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TURNER] withdraw his formal amendment?

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I do.

The question was taken on the previous amendment offered by Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. HEPBURN. I move to strike out the lines of the pending bill 202, 203, 204, 205, and 206.

Mr. Chairman, so far as my information goes, the aim of this so-called harbor improvement at New Orleans is nothing more than the building of a levee, the broadening of a levee, and the pavement of a levee, for the convenience and protection of the people of New Orleans. If there is anything more than that in this proposed "improvement," I shall be glad to have some of the gentlemen from Louisiana instruct me at a proper time. My information is that opposite the city of New Orleans throughout the whole breadth of the Mississippi River there is a navigable depth of over fifty feet of water.

A MEMBER. One hundred feet.

Another MEMBER. Two hundred feet.

Mr. HEPBURN. There is nothing needed at that place for the navigation of the river except a proper bank, a proper quay for the convenience of shippers—just exactly such an "improvement" as at the city of Burlington, at the city of Davenport, at the city of Dubuque, the people, for their own convenience and out of their own treasury, have from year to year been making. I know of no reason why the people of New Orleans should not be required to provide themselves with these ordinary facilities of commerce as the people of other cities along the river do. This is simply a provision for the paving of one of the public thoroughfares of the city of New Orleans, a thoroughfare upon which there is perhaps more burdensome travel and traffic than in any other part of that city. If I am in error about this I would be glad to have one of these gentlemen inform me of it.

Mr. KING. The gentleman is very greatly in error.

Mr. HEPBURN. Very well, sir; I will yield to you to explain wherein I am in error. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. KING. The gentleman is entirely in error. This money, if appropriated, will not be applied to any highway whatever.

Mr. HEPBURN. Is not this quay of yours, this landing, a highway?

Mr. KING. No.

Mr. HEPBURN. Do you not carry your freights there and receive your freights there?

Mr. KING. No, sir. This appropriation is to be applied to keep the harbor where it is.

Mr. HEPBURN. What is the harbor?

Mr. KING. This is to prevent the river by erosion from destroying the harbor.

Mr. ROWELL. Mr. Chairman, in order that we may understand what this "harbor" is for, it may be well to read from the report of the engineers on the subject. I read:

The project for laying 10,000 feet of mattress revetment, 400 feet wide, in Carrollton Bend was approved September 18, 1882. Work was begun October 9, 1883, but has made little progress to date, owing to trouble in securing a supply of brush.

* * * * * * *

On the right bank from Westwego to Algiers there has been serious caving, involving much loss to property of considerable present and much greater prospective value. Fully 40,000 feet of bank will require protection.

Under the statement of the Mississippi River Commission, the improvement of New Orleans Harbor devised by that commission was to protect the banks, and they say that fully 43,000 feet of bank will need protection to prevent the destruction of private property of large present and prospective value. There is no use in trying to escape the fact that in addition to the millions appropriated for the Mississippi River $150,000 is here proposed to be added to that amount for the purpose of protecting private property along the banks of that river. That is clearly the case, unless the river commission are mistaken in their report.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, in addition to what my friend [Mr. ROWELL] has said, I want to call attention to the fact that this improvement is on the bank of the river opposite to the city of New Orleans. It is for the protection of private property which lies on the other side of the stream—on the right bank of the river.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. HEPBURN; and on a rising vote there were—ayes 68, noes 60.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I call for tellers.

Mr. HEPBURN. Oh, I hope the gentleman will not delay the progress of the bill. [Laughter.]

Tellers were ordered; and the chairman appointed Mr. HEPBURN and Mr. BLANCHARD.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 64, noes 85.

Mr. HEPBURN. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. No quorum having voted, the tellers will keep their places. There is evidently a quorum present, and gentlemen will please vote.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 66, noes 97.

So the amendment was not adopted.

Mr. HEPBURN. I move to amend by striking out in line 204 the words "one hundred and."

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HEPBURN, there were—ayes 25, noes 68.

Mr. HEPBURN. No quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN. No quorum having voted, the Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. HEPBURN, and the gentleman from Louisiana, Mr. BLANCHARD.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 43, noes 121.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. VAN EATON. I offer the amendment which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 206 insert:
"Improving harbor at Natchez, Miss.: Continuing improvement, $200,000."

Mr. VAN EATON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HOLMAN. One word, Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman proceeds. Is it understood that the preceding paragraph—the paragraph relating to New Orleans—is passed?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VAN EATON] moves to add something to the end of that paragraph.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to move to strike out a portion of the paragraph, if I can be recognized.

Mr. WILLIS. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the paragraph the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] refers to is passed. This is another paragraph.

Mr. HOLMAN. When the Chair made the announcement that the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] was not agreed to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VAN EATON] rose——

The CHAIRMAN. And offered an additional paragraph.

Mr. WILLIS. I make the point that the paragraph in regard to the improvement at New Orleans has been passed.

The CHAIRMAN. When the Chair announced the result of the vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, the gentleman from Mississippi obtained recognition and sent his amendment to the desk. After it had been read the gentleman from Mississippi began his remarks, and then the gentleman from Indiana rose and asked the Chair a question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a point of order. The very moment the fact became apparent that a new paragraph was being offered I rose and addressed the Chair.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not be responsible as to when the gentleman from Indiana became aware of a fact. The fact is that the paragraph to which he refers has been passed. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. HISCOCK. Had the Clerk commenced the reading of the subsequent passage?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk had read the new paragraph sent up by the gentleman from Mississippi, and that gentleman had begun to argue the question. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to be heard upon a question of order. When the Chair had announced the result of the last vote, and before the Clerk had proceeded to read, the gentleman from Mississippi immediately upon the announcement of the Chair rose—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. HOLMAN. I have a question of order pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is trying to state his point of order.

Mr. WILLIS. I understand it has been decided.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am trying to state my point of order. When I observed that the gentleman from Mississippi was not proposing an amendment to the pending paragraph, but an independent paragraph, I instantly rose, because I desired to offer an amendment to the pending paragraph—the paragraph in regard to New Orleans Harbor. No other paragraph has been read. I could not intervene between the rising of the gentleman from Mississippi and the announcement made by the chairman, for the reason that there was no interval. I had a right to take it for granted, as I did, that the gentleman from Mississippi rose to make an amendment to the then pending paragraph, the only paragraph that had been read and that was before the committee. How then could I have intervened so as to meet the objection raised by the gentleman from Kentucky? I concede if the Clerk had proceeded to read the next following paragraph of the bill it would then have been too late, but he had not done so. The pending paragraph is the one that relates to the levees at New Orleans.

Mr. WILLIS. And the next was an entirely new subject, and the gentleman from Mississippi had begun his speech when interrupted.

The CHAIRMAN. The next paragraph in the bill had not been read.

Mr. WILLIS. But the paragraph submitted by the gentleman from Mississippi had been read and the gentleman had begun his speech before the gentleman from Indiana was on his feet.

Mr. VAN EATON. That is true.

Mr. HOLMAN. But the pending paragraph of the bill, to which amendments are still in order, is in regard to the New Orleans improvement.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is disposed to think that the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi is in the nature of an amendment to the paragraph as to New Orleans because he adds to it. Therefore that paragraph has not yet been parted from, although that amendment may or may not be adopted; and the Chair, on the statement of the gentleman from Indiana that he was endeavoring to get recognition, and sought it as soon as he could, will change the former ruling and hold it to be in order.

Mr. HEPBURN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to know——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair further suggests, as he did before to the gentleman from Indiana, if he was in order to amend the words passed over in the bill, that it would be proper for him to offer his amendment to be acted upon before that of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out the words——

Mr. VAN EATON. I think I am entitled to the floor and claim my rights.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is entitled to the floor if he insists upon it. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Indiana later.

Mr. HEPBURN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HEPBURN. I desire to know whether the paragraph composed of lines 203, 204, 205, and 206 is not still open to amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has just so stated, and an amendment is now pending to the paragraph and the gentleman from Mississippi has the floor.

Mr. HEPBURN. I have an amendment I desire at the proper time to offer.

Mr. VAN EATON. Mr. Chairman, I have offered this amendment in perfect good faith, and I respectfully request the attention of this committee while I compress a two hours' speech in something less than five minutes.

The Committee on Rivers and Harbors have, in some sense, brought into this House one of the most remarkable bills perhaps that has ever been brought into the House, and now when it comes to matters concerning which I and my constituents are interested, they avow the most extraordinary doctrine I have ever heard enunciated since I have been a member of this body, to wit, that these "landings," as they call them, the cities upon the banks of the Mississippi River, where hundreds of thousands of bales of cotton are annually shipped, and where are received the great products of the North and West, are not harbors at all, but were landings. Why, Mr. Chairman, only a year ago this same committee classed them as harbors in their bill. Thus they used this language on page 15 of the bill of that year. It will be remembered that they made the proposition or rather an appropriation in the following terms:

Improving Mississippi River from the head of the passes to Cairo, including the improvement and preservation of the harbors of New Orleans, Natchez, Vicksburg, Greenfield, Memphis, Hickman, and Columbus.

And to-day they object to any appropriation because, in the classical language of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON], they are mere landings on the Mississippi River, and not harbors at all.

I want to call the attention of this committee in good faith to this fact, that all the way from the Des Moines Rapids down to the mouth of the Mississippi this committee has only made appropriations for two harbors—one at Cairo and one at New Orleans—both of them, according to the language of the committee, if it is properly voiced by the gentleman from West Virginia, being merely "steamboat landings."

The fact is, sir, that in all of this magnificent country from Cairo down, including the cotton section of the country, not one dollar is appropriated, not one dollar is set apart for that country that comprises the great cotton-producing section of this country, and, I may say, of the world. To that whole region of country and its needs this committee has paid no attention. They have ignored it completely and entirely.

Now, with regard to Natchez, the particular amendment under consideration, it is a fact that within the last year or two the river has been threatening a cut-off above, which will likely leave the city a mile or two inland from the current and attack the town of Idalia, on the other side of the river, and destroy it.

The Mississippi River Commission has made an estimate for an appropriation here. Estimates have been made for proper harbors in all this magnificent country. And yet the gentleman tells us they are only landings. Why, sir, yesterday the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON] used this language:

I protest here against the appropriation of a solitary dollar to any landing on the Mississippi River. Those landings are not harbors in any sense of the word.

Then at the conclusion of his remarks he said that to make such appropriations "would destroy the whole object of the system of internal improvements, and it would shock the common sense of the country and arouse its just indignation against us."

Now, Mr. Chairman, for fear there might be some just indignation aroused against us, I thought I would look over the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. YOUNG obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. VAN EATON.

Mr. VAN EATON. I looked over the bill, and I wish to draw the attention of the committee to this remarkable fact: In West Virginia there was an appropriation last year of $1,500, and there is another this year of the same amount, to improve a mountain stream, the Buchanan River, which this report of the engineers says is only fifty-seven miles in length and can never be made navigable except for logs—logs! [Laughter]. Some man who owns some timber on that river wants to get out some sawlogs, and he can not do it unless this great Government will make an appropriation of $3,000 to get out his sawlogs.

But let me say a little more about Buchanan. It is good reading, this report. I would like to incorporate this portion of it in my remarks and publish it in the RECORD. It ought to be published. The report says of this and Tygart's Valley River—I suppose you all know Tygart's Valley River—[laughter]—the gentleman seems to have lately discovered the Buchanan and the Tygart's Valley Rivers up among the mountains. The report says:

Both rivers are exclusively rafting streams.

And it is for one of these that $1,500 is appropriated in this bill. The gentleman says his sense of propriety is shocked by an appropriation for the great cotton harbor on the great inland sea of America; but he wants to give $1,500 for the improvement of a little logging stream.

Mr. HUNT. Will the gentleman state what percentage of the estimate that is?

Mr. VAN EATON. I must decline to be interrupted. I am a young man and am easily scared. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, this remarkable Buchanan River that this committee wants to improve has a fall it appears of seven hundred feet—

Which—

Says the report—

is an average of more than nine feet to the mile.

And in one place the fall is sheer twenty feet right straight down, and the trouble is when they do manage to get their logs there they wear out before they get through. That is the fact. [Laughter.]

Now the engineer says further:

It is evident from the above summary statement that all that can be done to these streams is to remove the isolated bowlders and masses of rock that cause log jams, and thus facilitate the downward passage of—

Of what? Of ships, of steamboats, of barges? No, sir—

And thus facilitate the downward passage of logs.

[Laughter.]

There it is. That is the engineer's report. It says further:

In the present case I have to report that no survey is needed, as the preliminary examination has developed all of the essential facts.

Indeed, all a man would have to do would be to go and survey that gorge by his eye. [Laughter.] It is only fifty-seven miles long.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GIBSON rose.

Mr. VAN EATON. I should like to say just one word more.

Mr. GIBSON. I move to strike out the last five words.

Mr. VAN EATON. I desire to say just another word.

Mr. GIBSON. I will yield to the gentleman if I shall then have my five minutes.

Mr. VAN EATON. I should like to hear the gentleman whose sense of propriety is shocked by appropriations for harbors on the Mississippi River characterize in what he considers fit terms this appropriation for Buchanan River to facilitate the passage of logs.

Mr. GIBSON. In speaking on this bill on yesterday I said that the expenditure of money for the purpose of improving landings on the Mississippi River was calculated to shock the common sense of this country. I repeat that language now, and repeat it with reason for it. Not one solitary dollar of this money proposed for the purpose of improving what they call these harbors is to be applied to giving one inch of water that any vessel may float upon it, not even that a log may float upon it; but every dollar of it is to be used for the improvement of levees and landings of parties engaged in trading in those towns.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Is that the case with the New Orleans appropriation?

Mr. GIBSON. It is the case with every dollar of it. Not one dollar is to be expended in digging out and deepening the channel. No ship is able to float better by reason of it. But it is to protect the property of those who are engaged in trading on the banks of the river. I protest against the use of the public money for that purpose; and I appeal to the common sense of this House and to the common sense of the country to sustain me in that protest.

But the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VAN EATON] undertakes to criticise me very facetiously. That gentleman's record in this House shows how much he is in favor of releasing the people from public plunderers and from the burdens imposed on them and of improving the facilities for commerce and the interchange of commodities between the States. It is not for him to criticise my actions or the actions of any other member of this House who has sought to save the public property and restore it to those who own it.

But now as to West Virginia, and as to the gentleman's talk about the Buchanan River, I have this to say——

Mr. VAN EATON. Perhaps the gentleman would like this engineer's report to read from. [Laughter.]

Mr. GIBSON. No, sir; I have seen that report, and I am as well acquainted with that as I am with the record in this House of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VAN EATON]. Although he may be "young" and "a new member," he has made a record, and I have seen it.

Now, as to the Buchanan River, I know nothing about that river; I have no personal knowledge of it; it is not in my district, nor have I any interest in it. I only know that the Engineer Corps of the United States Army, in charge of the commercial improvements of the rivers and harbors of this country, came to this Congress with a report strongly recommending that that river be opened, so that, as the engineers say, between fifty and one hundred million feet of oak timber, which is needed for ship-building along the Ohio and the Missouri and the Mississippi, can be gotten out, in order that the commerce of the great West may float upon its timbers.

Mr. HORR. Does the gentleman admit that that is the only commerce of that river—the floating down of lumber?

Mr. GIBSON. I declare to this committee that the only commerce that river has or can have is the letting out of millions and millions and millions of feet of timber which is required for the building of vessels to float upon the Western waters.

Mr. VAN EATON. Then there will be lots of "log-rolling" there. [Laughter.]

Mr. GIBSON. Yes, sir; and you understand "log-rolling," I suppose.

Mr. VAN EATON. There is $275,400 worth of "log-rolling" in this bill for the gentleman's State.

Mr. GIBSON. Well, sir, that only shows how much inferior I am to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VAN EATON]. If he had been there perhaps he would have had several millions.

Now, as to this stream, Buchanan River, I speak frankly, for I have no concealments to make. I based the recommendation for that improvement upon the report of the engineers. Colonel Merrill, who is on the Ohio River, and who is the engineer in charge, without any request from me, without any knowledge on my part, recommended that this appropriation be made.

Mr. HORR. Is there any appropriation made anywhere in this bill for improving a stream simply for the running of logs?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes; there are several such cases out West.

Mr. HORR. There are none in Michigan.

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes.

Mr. HORR. Not a dollar for any such stream in Michigan.

Mr. SPRINGER. Black Lake, just above Grand Haven; there never was any commerce there but logs.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, this is the first time that I have asked the indulgence of the House to say anything in regard to this bill. I had made up my mind to vote against the bill, and therefore had determined to content myself with my vote as an expression of my opinion in regard to it. But, Mr. Chairman, I rise now for the purpose of saying this: The other day, when a motion was made that the House take a recess until 10 o'clock the next morning, the assurance was given by the chairman of the committee having this bill in charge that before 12 o'clock next day should arrive he would move that the House should adjourn, so that the ordinary business of the House might be carried on after 12 o'clock. To-day, when the motion was made by the same gentleman that a recess be taken until 10 o'clock on Monday next, he declined to give any such assurance to the House; and I have learned that it is the purpose of the friends of this bill, or at least of gentlemen that are pressing it, that on Monday next, if the House meets here in pursuance of the order for a recess, the House shall not adjourn, but shall go on with the consideration of this bill next morning. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to remind gentlemen that we have three important appropriation bills ready for consideration——

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of order.

Mr. VAN EATON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know on which side of my amendment the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] is speaking. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] will state his point of order.

Mr. WILLIS. My point of order is that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] is proceeding entirely against the rules in the remarks that he is making.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] will proceed in order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I did not hear the ruling of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair ruled that the gentleman was proceeding out of order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Well, Mr. Chairman, I have perhaps stated sufficient facts as a basis for what further I have to say. I have reminded the House that there are three appropriation bills pending. It is already known that next Monday the bill making appropriations for the postal service——

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I again raise the point of order, and I ask that the gentleman take his seat until he can proceed in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] will proceed in order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then, Mr. Chairman, if I have not been in order heretofore, I make the motion that this committee do now rise. I make that motion with the view of making a motion that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn until Monday at 12 o'clock.

The motion being taken on the motion of Mr. TOWNSHEND that the committee rise, there were—ayes 52, noes 98.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I call for tellers.

A MEMBER. No quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN. No quorum having voted——

Mr. SPRINGER. A quorum is not necessary on a motion that the committee rise, which is equivalent to the motion in the House to adjourn.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on ordering tellers.

The question being taken, there were ayes 32—less than one-fifth of a quorum.

The tellers were not ordered; and the motion that the committee rise was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the amendment presented by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VAN EATON].

Mr. VAN EATON. I withdraw the amendment for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi being withdrawn, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the pending paragraph by striking out "jurisdiction of the Mississippi River Commission" and inserting "direction of the Secretary of War," so as to provide that this appropriation be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War through the Government's Corps of Engineers.

Mr. Chairman, up to a comparatively recent date, some five years ago, all the public works of the country have been under the supervision of the War Department, controlled and conducted by the Engineer Corps of the Army; and there are many arguments in favor of the resumption and continuation of this policy, and of its application to the Mississippi River and the various improvements connected with it.

I have not, I believe, heard any one call in question the integrity or capacity of this body of trained public officers—the Engineer Corps of the Army. In point of integrity and capacity they certainly equal any body of engineers in civil life who can be employed by the Government in connection with its public works. The fact of their being trained to this employment, and having no personal motives in connection with the public work, having only the public interests in view, makes it in my judgment a matter of the highest possible moment, in order to secure public confidence in the administration of your public works, that the Engineer Corps of the Army, under its responsible chief, should be employed to direct and control them. Has anything in our history occurred to justify the belief that we can employ upon, works of this character any body of citizens more eminently qualified for these duties?

Mr. WILLIS. My friend will allow me to say that this is not a new departure. The improvement of the Mississippi has always been under such direction as is proposed in the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am, of course, aware of the fact that the improvements on the Mississippi River in recent years have been taken out of the regular order—not placed in charge of a body of men who have for years enjoyed the public confidence, but in charge of gentlemen not connected as a body with any department of Government—gentlemen differing with an engineer officer who is prominently connected with them. Thus you have the spectacle of a regular engineer of your service advising against the plan of his colleagues on that commission.

This commission stands by itself. One of the members is a very respectable and intelligent lawyer of my State, who perhaps had no acquaintance with the Mississippi River until his recent appointment—a gentleman devoted to his profession, knowing nothing, I think, about engineering or hydraulics, knowing nothing about public works—a man of ability and integrity, I have no doubt, but wholly unacquainted with the business of managing great public works. Are you to displace competent and trained public officials who have been connected with the Government works for years, under a responsible head, and put in their places lawyers whose education has no relation to public works? I think, sir, that these works should be restored to the control of responsible officers of the Government, to a responsible department, so that our people may have confidence in the capacity and integrity with which these public works are conducted and confidence in the proper expenditure of their money.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I regret, Mr. Chairman, that my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is so badly informed on this subject. This work at the city of New Orleans is being done, and has been done for years, under the control of Major Stickney, of the United States Corps of Engineers. He is the executive officer of the Mississippi River Commission, the head of which is General Gillmore, of the Corps of Engineers. Other members of that commission are General Comstock and Major Suter, of the Corps of Engineers. Another member is Mr. Mitchell, of the Coast and Geodetic Survey. When the gentleman from Indiana speaks of the eminent lawyer from his own State who is a member of that commission he refers to Mr. Robert S. Taylor, who was appointed, in pursuance of the requirement of law that one or two civilian engineers be appointed and one person who was not an engineer.

So that this money which is to be expended at New Orleans is to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, in accordance with plans, specifications, and recommendations of the Mississippi River Commission, just as it has been done for years. Now, I say, is there any more responsible body of men to which the expenditure of that money could be confided? In other words, the Secretary of War first, General Gillmore, Major Comstock, and Major Suter, and then the executive officer in charge, being Major Stickney, of the Corps of Engineers. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the present amendment is exhausted.

Mr. REAGAN. I move to strike out the last word. If amended by striking out "under the discretion," in line 205, and insert "according to the plan," then it would be done according to the plans of the Mississippi Commission, as the work is now being done, the money being expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HUNT. I have no objection either.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is not what I am aiming at.

Mr. REAGAN. Then I desire to say this: I think the gentleman from Indiana is laboring under some mistake. He agrees in improving that river. It has gone on for some years on the idea that the improvement was to be made under the plans of the commission composed of officers of the Army and of the Geodetic Survey and of civilians, but chiefly under the control of officers of the Army, while the plan is to be furnished by the commission. The expenditures are made under the direction of the Secretary of War. If the purpose is to take this from under the plan of the improvement of the Mississippi River as presented by the commission, then it seems to me it would be a mistake, unless it has become the purpose to abolish that commission and to abolish the plan and fall back to where we were before, and that means no effort shall be made to improve the Mississippi River.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] misapprehends me. But before referring to his observations I wish to say to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] that he, too, misapprehends me. What I am complaining of is the plan and method of the Mississippi River Commission. I had the honor, as one of the members of the last House of Representatives and as a member of the committee of the House, to visit that river and the improvements in progress and examine the works at Plum Point, at Lake Providence, at Vicksburg, and wherever else those works of the commission were then in progress. And what I object to is the continuance of works on the present plan of the commission. It is the plan and method of the commission of which I am complaining. It is the absence of responsibility of which I complain. Millions have been expended with no satisfactory results up to this time, and yet no one can be called to account. There is no responsible head to the body of citizens who were spending in their own way these millions annually.

What have been the results of this system up to this time? Gentlemen, I presume, are aware that a very large percentage of your expenditures on these works have been simply for repair of works only partially completed, repairs from the beginning. The reports now lying before you state the fact that, notwithstanding the work done to the extent of hundreds of thousands of dollars at, above, and below Plum Point, the present indication is that "Plum Point" will soon become "Plum Island." The river, indifferent to these large expenditures, is working its way eastward to a new channel.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly; a question.

Mr. DUNN. Does not the gentleman approve the plan of John Cowdin, who is neither an Army engineer, a civil engineer, a lawyer, nor a man of any responsibility in any official sense?

Mr. HOLMAN. That is the gentleman's question.

Mr. DUNN. Is it not true?

Mr. HOLMAN. That is a proper question and I will answer it.

Mr. DUNN. Is it not true?

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe the outlet system for the protection of the valley of the Mississippi is the better and safer one, and perhaps the only practicable one. You closed up in part, by the expenditure of the public money, Bonnet Carré crevasse according to the plan of the commission two years ago. What was the result? Will the gentleman from Arkansas answer that question, if he pleases? Well, what was the result? A region of country extending from the river to Lake Ponchartrain, which had been devastated for years by that crevasse, was not reclaimed, but the closing up of that crevasse in the east bank of the river by the expenditure in part of public money inured to the benefit of a railroad corporation, and then a new crevasse soon occurred below in the west bank, and the waters of the Mississippi rushed over an extended region of the most fertile portions of that great State of Louisiana. Yes, sir; another crevasse occurs which takes the place of the one closed up by the commission and carries desolation and ruin to a fertile region of vast extent. My belief is, and it is a belief entertained by many intelligent engineers, that a properly adjusted and regulated outlet system is the only safety to the great valley of the Mississippi.

Mr. DUNN. I do not know of an engineer in the world who approves it.

Mr. HOLMAN. But I do not at this time propose to discuss that question. It will come up later. For the present I only insist on placing public works under a responsible department.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HOLMAN. Excuse me.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. You ask that the work should be placed under the control of responsible Government officers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. WILLIS. Let us have a vote.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I move to strike out the last three words, and I will detain the committee but a moment. I do this for the purpose of saying simply that the statement of the gentleman from Indiana that Bonnet Carré crevasse was closed in the interest of a railroad company is not in accordance with the facts.

Mr. HOLMAN. Just a word now. Let me ask the gentleman from Louisiana if there is not now a railroad constructed on the dike that was constructed across the mouth of that outlet? Did not a railroad join with the Government in the furnishing and expenditure of the money for the construction and completion of the dike, and is not that dike to-day the track of a railroad, and was not the Government funds expended on the dike that closed up the crevasse? I ask the gentleman if that is not true?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will ask the gentleman for his authority for that statement.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why, it is a fact well known. It is unquestionable. There is a gentleman on the other side of the Chamber within sound of my voice, if he will give me his attention, who knows this to be a fact.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will say to the gentleman that we have no such information. We know nothing of any crevasse that was ever closed under the circumstances he mentions. On the contrary, I do know that this Bonnet Carré crevasse was closed in good faith by the commission, and was put in good repair long before the railroad to which he refers was built. I withdraw the amendment. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out the last word.

I will inform my friend from Louisiana that his State and the railroad corporation in question and the commission each furnished a portion of the funds which built the dike across the mouth of the Bonnet Carré crevasse and closed it up; and that the said dike is now a part of the road-bed of that railroad.

Mr. HISCOCK. Let me ask the gentleman from Indiana a question.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HISCOCK. Do we understand the gentleman to say that the levee is now used by a railroad company, and that upon this levee $150,000 is to be expended?

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, no, sir; I am speaking of outlet system and the closing of the Bonnet Carré crevasse above New Orleans, a crevasse closed up in part by appropriations out of the public Treasury through this commission joined with the State of Louisiana and a railroad company, which company is now using this dike for a road-bed; and I think the gentleman from New York is aware of that fact and will bear out the statement.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Again I ask the gentleman for his authority.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from New York is aware of the fact.

Mr. HISCOCK (from his seat). Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. A portion of the railroad funds was applied to that subject, some money of the State of Louisiana was applied to it, and a part of the appropriations made by us for the improvement of the Mississippi went into that work, which I regret is now, or was recently, used as a road-bed by this railroad which engaged in its construction. And after the Bonnet Carré crevasse was closed, as I have said, a crevasse which had done but comparatively little damage, involving only a limited region, another occurred a short distance below that point, in the western bank of the river, flooding one of the most fertile portions of the State of Louisiana, of vast extent.

I say, sir, therefore that so far as I am advised—and such was certainly the opinion of other members of the committee sent by this House during the last Congress to investigate the subject—a well-regulated system of outlets for the floods of that great river is the only solution of the important question of reclaiming from the floods that vast and fertile region.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Let me ask the gentleman from Indiana a question: Has my friend from Indiana at hand the opinion, or is he aware of the fact, that any engineer of ability has indorsed that plan?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, I think so; more than one; and yet at this moment I do not recall them.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I should be glad to know who.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have not the name in my memory, but I think there are several could be named.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. The universal authority of the best engineers is against that plan as destructive to the navigation of the Mississippi River.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think not all, by any means. The gentleman is, I think, mistaken in saying that this is the universal opinion.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I have never heard of but one engineer who indorsed a scintilla of any such doctrine.

Mr. HOLMAN. The experience of many years in dealing with the river, in the judgment of many intelligent rivermen, has demonstrated the soundness of the proposition. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw the pro forma amendment?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do.

Mr. LONG. I ask that the pending amendment be again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 205 and 206 strike out the words "jurisdiction of the Mississippi River Commission" and insert "under the direction of the Secretary of War."

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 71, noes 60.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I demand tellers. [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist upon the demand?

Mr. BLANCHARD. At the request of the chairman of the committee I withdraw the demand for tellers.

So (no further count being demanded) the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEPBURN. I desire to amend by inserting at the end of the paragraph what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the words "Secretary of War," in line 206, insert: "Provided, That no portion of said $150,000 shall be expended in the repair, erection, maintenance, or paving of levees, or in the grading or revetment of the banks of the Mississippi River owned by private parties or municipalities."

Mr. THOMAS. I hope that will be accepted.

Mr. HUNT. I ask for the reading of the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Louisiana desire to be heard in opposition to the amendment?

Mr. HUNT. I do, sir; I rise for that purpose.

Mr. Chairman, I consider it my duty to correct the misapprehensions which have been expressed here regarding this matter under debate. The $150,000 to be given is, strictly speaking, a harbor appropriation. A harbor is a place for the shelter of ships—a port—and the $150,000 proposed to be appropriated is to be expended for the necessary protection and security of the great harbor at New Orleans, the second harbor in importance in the United States.

Mr. Chairman, the engineer officer says in speaking of the $1,400,000 of property immediately involved:

But this does not represent the whole interest at stake. The river front here is being used for purposes of commerce and navigation, and these interests suffer very much from the caving in of wharves, railroad-inclines, and depots. The commercial interest is much greater than the value of property already located there, and its value can not be estimated.

This refers to the Goldsborough bank. Further on the same officer says:

In order to make the city of New Orleans secure from danger of breaks in the levee, and from being gradually washed away, it is necessary to protect the bank in this bend—

The Carrollton bend—

but the immediate importance of the work is small when compared with what it is at Goldsborough.

There are two places, then, to be protected—one at Goldsborough bank and the other at the Carrollton bend—and the protection of both places is required for the security of one of the greatest harbors in America, near the mouth of the Mississippi River, second in commercial importance only to the port of New York.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. HUNT. Excuse me; my time is too short. In the report of the engineers it appears that the experiment for protection is now going on, and their estimate is for $683,000. This includes their plan of revetment. It includes a plan of improvement in accordance with the recommendations, specifications, and plans of the River Commission, of scientific, symmetrical, and of general application under correct superintendence. It requires, evidently, proper liberty and discretion, and is an indispensable public harbor improvement in the strictest sense of the terms.

The opinion that the diffusion of waters will increase and benefit navigation is not considered a respectable opinion in modern engineering science, and the attempt, Mr. Chairman, to prescribe limitations to the proper discretion of the scientific men connected with the civil service and particularly with the engineering corps, such as will prevent this improvement at New Orleans from being carried out in good faith, is the indulgence of a legislative liberty which, if successful, might result in the loss of interests of property and of commerce of the most general character and of the most important nature.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HEPBURN. These improvements are not on the east bank of the river, but they are at the town of Algiers; and the gentleman from Louisiana is entirely mistaken, in my judgment, when he indulges in the affirmation that they are in any way connected with the commerce of the Mississippi River——

Mr. HUNT. I read what the engineer said.

Mr. HEPBURN. Or with the safety of the vessels navigating the river. I venture the statement that these improvements are solely or mainly for the protection of the individual property of residents living opposite the city of New Orleans.

Mr. HUNT. You are mistaken. It is not so.

Mr. HEPBURN. I appeal from the interested declaration of the gentleman to that better statement that I find in the report of the Mississippi River Commission.

Mr. HUNT. What do you mean by "interested statement?"

Mr. HEPBURN. I mean what I say, that you are interested as a Representative in securing this appropriation.

Mr. HUNT. Interested—how?

Mr. HEPBURN. As a Representative.

Mr. HUNT. Do you mean as a man of honor and public spirit?

Mr. HEPBURN. I mean as a man of the very highest honor.

Mr. HUNT. Then I have no objections to your statement.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, let me call your attention to the language of this report in regard to the importance of protecting Goldsborough bank. That is a part of the harbor that, with Carrollton bend, constitutes largely the harbor that is to be improved. The engineer says:

IMPORTANCE OF PROTECTING GOLDSBOROUGH BANK.

From my report of November 19, 1883, the value of land and improvements in the Goldsborough bend, which will be lost in a few years if the bank is not protected, was estimated to be $1,400,000. But this does not represent the whole interest at stake. The river front here is being used for purposes of commerce and navigation, and these interests suffer very much from the caving in of wharves, railroad inclines, and depots.

The commercial interest is much greater than the value of property already located there, and its value can not be estimated.

COMPARISON.

The caving of bank in Carrollton bend causes a very small loss of property compared to what it does in Goldsborough bend. The commercial interests in Carrollton bend are almost nothing, while in Goldsborough bend they are very great and are rapidly increasing, and they make the work of improvement more difficult. In order to make the city of New Orleans secure from dangers of breaks in levee and from being gradually washed away it is necessary to protect the bank in Carrollton bend; but the immediate importance of the work is small compared to what it is at Goldsborough.

Respectfully submitted.

W. G. PRICE,
United States Assistant Engineer.

It seems to me that that sustains the statement that this is not for the protection of the commerce of the country; that it is not for the purpose of establishing a harbor where ships may ride in safety; but that this money is to be expended where these individual interests are invested, where they are jeopardized, where there is a possibility of large pecuniary loss. And these gentlemen are seeking, undoubtedly in harmony with their ideas of propriety, the protection of these private interests of their constituents with the money of the public, and that is what I propose to prevent, if I can, by asking the adoption of this amendment.

I desire also to incorporate with my remarks the following passage from the report of the Mississippi River Commission:

NEW ORLEANS HARBOR.

At date of last report a mattress 400 feet in width was being laid in Carrollton bend. Owing to delays in receiving material the rising river forced a suspension of operations when 470 feet of this mat had been completed and sunk, and the work has not been resumed, owing to the more pressing necessity of protecting the bank in Goldsborough bend. Here the protection will consist of a series of sloping submerged spurs, so designed and located as to move the current of the river away from the bank to be protected. These spurs rest on a mattress 200 feet wide and 350 feet long laid on the bed of the river and normal to the bank, beginning at low-water mark. The spurs themselves are built up of timber cribs, filled with brush and loaded with stone. The width of the structure at the bottom is 60 feet, which diminishes by steps to 20 feet at the top, the size and arrangement of the cribs being such that the top of the finished structure will have a slope of 1 vertical to 3 horizontal feet from low-water mark to the bed of the river. The distance apart of the spurs will vary from 500 to 1,600 feet, according to the curvature of the banks. One spur is now well under way, and two more will probably be nearly completed with the funds now available.

The work is experimental, and its efficiency can only be determined after the subsidence of the next flood. The estimate for continuing this work and for completing the revetment in Carrollton bend is $683,600.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I move to strike out the last two words. I do so because I do not wish the statements of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. HEPBURN] made, as I now they are, in good faith, to go unchallenged. The gentleman speaks of this improvement at Goldsborough and at Carrollton. Although these villages are within the limits of the city of New Orleans I will say, for my friend [Mr. HUNT], that they are outside of his district.

Now, then, what we need at New Orleans is—I will be very frank with this committee—what we need there is not a deepening of the river, because the river is already sufficiently deep; but there enters in from the mouth of the Mississippi a vast amount of ocean shipping which finds its way to the wharves of New Orleans, extending four or five miles in length on both sides of the river, and is there moored for purposes of commerce. The city of New Orleans, as gentlemen know, is situated in a bend of the Mississippi—hence its name of the "Crescent City." It is well known to every one who knows anything about the Mississippi River that at times acres of land will fall into the stream as a result of caving. Within a short distance of the bank of the river in New Orleans is located the custom-house of the Government, which cost, if I recollect right, about $2,000,000. Now, in order to prevent this immense caving in of the banks on both sides of the river in a city of nearly 300,000 inhabitants, a city with the greatest amount of shipping of any in the United States except the city of New York, we ask that this $150,000 be appropriated to be used for the legitimate purpose of the preservation of the harbor of New Orleans. It is not to protect anybody's private property. It is just as legitimate, I submit in all candor, to expend money in preserving a harbor as in maintaining the depth of water in a harbor. Mr. Chairman, these works that are being constructed at Goldsborough and at Carrollton, just at the upper edge of the city of New Orleans, are for the purpose of preventing the caving of the bank there and for the purpose of deflecting the current which, on its way down along the city front, where the shipping is moored, will cause caving and the destruction of the harbor.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the amendment reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of line 206 the following:

"Provided, That no portion of said $150,000 shall be expended in the repairing, erection, maintenance, or paving of levees, or in the grading or revetment of the banks of the Mississippi River owned by private parties or municipalities."

Mr. HISCOCK. I suggest to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] that he add to his amendment the words, "or for the protection of private property."

Mr. HUNT. Better not give the money at all.

Mr. YOUNG. I would ask the gentleman whether he means this money to apply for the reclamation of overflowed lands or merely for the protection of cities?

Mr. HEPBURN. I mean just what the amendment says. I do not want the money to be used for the construction, paving, or maintenance of levees.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. HEPBURN, and on a rising vote there were—ayes 61, nays 60.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I demand tellers.

Mr. WILLIS. I hope my friend from Louisiana will not do that.

Mr. KING. Yes; let us have tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the chairman appointed Mr. HEPBURN and Mr. BLANCHARD.

Pending the announcement of the vote,

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, would it be in order that the committee do now rise?

The CHAIRMAN. It would not be in order.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky (after a pause). Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the rule which declares that when the House is left without a quorum there are but two things in order.

The CHAIRMAN. It has not yet been ascertained whether there is a quorum or not. As soon as the Chair ascertains that fact he will act accordingly.

The tellers reported—ayes 53, noes 67.

Mr. BUDD. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rules of the House, it being ascertained that there is no quorum voting, the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Pending that motion, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky on the right [Mr. WILLIS] moves that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BLACKBURN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HAMMOND reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8130) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MILLS. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Chair will submit certain personal requests.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman object to the submission of personal requests?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. My motion has precedence.

Mr. MILLS. It has not.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent to present a report for the sake of having it printed and placed on the Calendar.

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. YAPLE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

A bill (S. 1793) to amend section 4434 of title 52 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning commerce, navigation, and the regulation of steam vessels.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Mr. Speaker, is that privileged?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is a matter of the highest privilege known to the rules.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Against a motion to adjourn?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Against a motion to adjourn.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] moves that when this House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Does that motion take precedence of my motion that the House do now adjourn?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair certainly thinks it does. The House must determine the time to which it will adjourn before it adjourns, and the rule so declares. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS].

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, pending that motion I ask unanimous consent (as it is evident that the remaining time will be consumed) that the House now take a recess until 10 o'clock on Monday next.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I object. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made, and the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, has not the House determined to take a recess at 6 o'clock this evening?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the order of the House. The motion is now made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. MILLS, there were—ayes 14, noes 66.

Mr. MILLS. I call for tellers.

Several MEMBERS. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No quorum having voted, tellers are ordered; and the Chair appoints the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. WHITE, and the gentleman from Texas, Mr. MILLS.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. This is not my motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois, Mr. TOWNSHEND, will act as a teller with the gentleman from Texas.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 2.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (before the tellers had announced the negative vote). Pending the count by the tellers, the Chair asks unanimous consent to submit several reports from the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

There being no objection,

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

A bill (S. 475) granting arrears of pension to Emily Agnel;

A bill (S. 1823) granting a pension to Ebenezer K. Marden; and

A bill (S. 750) granting a pension to Catharine Schools.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

A bill (S. 646) for the relief of H. G. P. White, Peter Hanger, and L. T. Green.

Mr. HOLMES, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 7577) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour of 6 o'clock having arrived, the House now, in pursuance of its previous order, stands in recess until 10 o'clock a. m. on Monday next.

AFTER RECESS.

The recess having expired, the House at 10 o'clock a. m. (Monday, February 9) resumed its session, Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, as the House is very well aware, the recess which has just expired was taken for the purpose of resuming this morning the consideration of the river and harbor bill. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] wants to waste public time, he has it in his power to do so. If his motion is voted down, I shall ask the House to continue the consideration of the river and harbor bill, with the honest purpose of finishing it. We have been delayed in the progress of this bill because of the want of a quorum. As the Speaker is well aware, a good part of this House has been engaged in making up a Cabinet for the next President—and various members of the Committee on Appropriations, its chairman and several other members, have been included in that—and another portion of them have been engaged in festivities, and by their absence we have been frequently left without a quorum, and hence delay has occurred in the progress of this bill. But as they are all here now, and as the Cabinet, I hope, is made up, and as I hope we are now ready for business, I trust this House will vote down the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, and let us go on in good faith with this river and harbor bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, during the whole of the time that the river and harbor bill has been under consideration I have up to Saturday last voted every time with the friends of the bill to facilitate its passage. On Saturday I asked the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to let the House understand that he would permit an adjournment to-day just before 12 o'clock, all the time till then being occupied with this bill. But the gentleman declined to give any such assurance.

Now, it was made known last week that the Committee on Appropriations would not interfere during that week with this bill; but notice was given that they would to-day seek the floor for the purpose of bringing up general appropriation bills. I feel, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WILLIS. I hope the gentleman——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I did not interrupt my friend.

Mr. WILLIS. I just ask one moment. It has been suggested to me that a remark I made just now in regard to the absence of members may be misconstrued, and I desire to withdraw it.

Mr. GIBSON. And not have it appear in the RECORD.

Mr. WILLIS. Have it considered as ignored.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Now, I want to say to the gentleman from Kentucky I would be willing again to do all in my power to facilitate action on his bill as he knows I have heretofore done until Saturday last. But I feel, Mr. Speaker, that now the Committee on Rivers and Harbors should give way for the consideration of the general appropriation bills, which are now ready. The Post-Office appropriation bill and the legislative appropriation bill are ready. I would ask my friend to remember that when his bill goes over to the Senate the Committee on Commerce will perhaps have no other bill to consider, whereas the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate will have to consider all these appropriation bills, and certainly we should get them to the Senate as soon as possible. I feel that in order to avoid the danger of an extra session we ought to take up these appropriation bills which are ready and get them out of the way, and in the intervals which may occur between these bills the gentleman from Kentucky can proceed with the river and harbor bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Allow me just one word. Two of the general appropriation bills—the Post-Office bill and the legislative bill—are ready for consideration; and I do not believe that either of them will occupy the House more than a few hours. I think the Post-Office bill can be got through to-day and the legislative bill to-morrow; and then there will be no other general appropriation bill ready for immediate consideration.

The sundry civil bill will be the next, and I think the interval between the Post-Office and the legislative appropriation bill can be well devoted to finishing up the river and harbor bill. Then we can take up the sundry civil bill, and then the peril of unfortunate delay will be avoided.

Mr. WILLIS. I desire to say this committee has in good faith, as I think the House will bear witness, been as expeditious as we could to dispose of this bill. We have already passed several points in the bill which have been objected to, and the committee has amendments to other points objected to which I think will be satisfactory to the House and the Committee of the Whole. The only questions that remain now are the reading of the bill and getting through with it. We are at the point of Galveston, and the committee has an amendment in regard to that which meets with the approbation of the committee, and I think will meet with the approbation of every member of the House. I believe so; at least I hope so. It will, I think, too, give rise to no debate.

When the Mississippi River is reached I say to the gentleman from Indiana, who is interested in that, the committee has an amendment eliminating Captain Eads from any control and limiting the expenditure to the plan in the first and second Mississippi River Commission reports, which gets rid of the costly revetment system to which several gentlemen here are opposed. The committee have in good faith endeavored to take out of the bill everything objectionable, and it now remains whether this costly plant of the Government scattered over the country shall be unused, at a loss of hundreds of thousands of dollars, or whether we shall make the necessary provision for the great rivers and harbors of the country, which we can do in this session. The gentleman can make this issue at any time during the day if we pass the hour of 12 o'clock, and I submit in good faith, and as a matter of good sense, if we pass 12 o'clock to-day, the District of Columbia Committee will have the day after 2 o'clock. The Journal will be read; the morning hour will take up another hour; the call of committees, which you can not get rid of, will take up another hour; then the wrangle between these committees, if we have a wrangle—the contest between them will take the day.

In the interest of the expedition of the public business let us go on and pass these two hours which the House by an overwhelming vote has set apart, as the gentleman knows, for the consideration of the river and harbor bill, and not waste two hours now in fruitless contention; because we all understand we can easily tide over these two hours without any one being benefited by it. Let us go on in good faith and consider the bill, and when we pass 12 o'clock let the gentleman from Illinois get up and move the committee rise for the purpose of considering the Post-Office bill, and we will have an end of the contest, and we will have the benefit of the whole day instead of allowing it to be wasted in the call of the States.

Mr. HOLMAN. Can not the gentleman consent before 12 o'clock is reached that the adjournment shall take place in the usual way?

Mr. WILLIS. Does not the gentleman know the motion I make is in the interest of saving time? If you do get the floor five minutes after 12 o'clock you can get up then, and if you can get the majority of the House you will have the benefit of the day. If we go on with the programme the gentleman suggests we will consume two hours; we will only waste them. If we remain in session, what I mean is that when we pass 12 o'clock the gentleman from the Appropriations Committee can make the motion, and if a majority of the House sustains him, then they can go on with the Post-Office appropriation bill and save three hours.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend from Kentucky must see we can not pass 12 o'clock without adjournment, or we will lose the day.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I desire to say to the gentleman from Kentucky, if he will give me his attention, I most earnestly desire he may use the two hours this morning in the consideration of his bill. If I could get an assurance then the House would adjourn, and let the ordinary business of the House be proceeded with, I would take my seat.

Mr. WILLIS. I will go further, to show my perfect good faith. This House knows, Mr. Speaker, that this is the District of Columbia Committee day, and that committee has no business to call up. The first business is the call of States for the formal introduction of bills and joint resolutions; and no one will introduce bills or joint resolutions at this late day, as there can be no expectation of getting them through at this period of the session. To show my perfect good faith I will go further; I will say in response to the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois, and agree myself that the committee shall rise and test the question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Let the hour of 12 o'clock be passed even for one minute and there will be no session of Monday, and it will be the continuation of the legislative day of Saturday.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to yield to me. I do not belong to either of these committees that seek to bring before the House their respective measures. I have endeavored to facilitate the Committee on Commerce in every way I could in consideration of the river and harbor bill. There is no doubt about the fact we are uncertain as to whether or not all of these bills can be passed before the 4th of March. Whatever may be the opinion of several gentlemen composing these committees there is an unrest in my own mind as well as in that of other gentlemen as to whether they can be passed or not.

It is a grave situation and we ought to proceed carefully in reference to it. The river and harbor bill is the only bill that the Senate Committee on Commerce will have to consider when it shall have reached them. The bulk of the appropriation bills proper have not been passed by this House. When we shall have passed them they will, of course, go to the Senate and undergo the examination of the Senate committee, come back into the Senate, and each in its turn will have to go through the process of examination, consideration, and amendment in that body.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. May I interrupt my friend from Georgia to say I am advised that the Senate Appropriation Committee has no bill before it at all now? I understand they are all before the Senate, and that there is nothing, unless this bill shall be sent to them, for that committee to work upon.

Mr. RYAN. I beg to correct my friend from Illinois.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am informed that they have no bill before them.

Mr. RYAN. That is a mistake; there are bills pending now before that committee.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. What bills?

Mr. BLOUNT. It is not a matter of so much consequence whether they have bills now to consider or not; one thing is certain, they have bills before the Senate which they are bound to look after. If, however, that committee has bills before it, it is altogether likely that they will soon be disposed of, and the committee will have to wait on the House. These bills ought to go to the Senate committee at once.

Mr. Speaker, I have had some experience, I may be permitted to say, at the close of a session of Congress as to the difficulties encountered by the Committee on Appropriations, and especially those who are placed on conference committees at such a time as this; and I do think in all that experience there has been nothing so straining to the patience, time, and endurance of the individual members of this House as the overcrowding of work in conference committees at the close of the session.

The very Post-Office bill which we are now seeking to consider is an illustration. Having been a member of that committee I know that on one night the conferees were in session until after 1 o'clock in the morning; and on another night, being the closing night of the session, they were continually engaged until 4 o'clock in the morning endeavoring to agree to a conference report. This applies to all the appropriation bills; and this will be the situation of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate when we come to the closing hours of the session, while the Committee on Commerce of the Senate will have nothing but this bill all the while to take up and consider. It seems to me it is a very easy matter for us to take up the river and harbor bill in the intervals between the consideration of the other appropriation bills and send them over to the Senate, so that that committee can have time to consider and report them to the Senate and bring the two Houses to a vote on any questions of disagreement that may arise.

I do trust, sir, that these annual appropriation bills, which can not fail without involving an extra session, will command the first consideration of this House.

Mr. HAMMOND. Will my colleague from Georgia allow me a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. HAMMOND. The point as I understand it now is how to avoid the hour that is provided for under the new rule for the consideration of business to which no objection is made, and also the call of States; and the Committee on Rivers and Harbors say that at a quarter past 12 o'clock they will allow the committee to rise and a test be made between the two bills pending at that time. Would it not then be a positive saving of time to go on for two hours and pass over the Monday's session, by waiting until half past 12 o'clock, and then test the question in the House between the consideration of these two bills?

Mr. BLOUNT. But the two committees of the House are not themselves agreed as to what is the best thing to be done; and in the midst of this and that suggestion we are likely to succeed in accomplishing nothing, as in all probability the whole time will be wasted. No man can foresee the result.

Mr. HAMMOND. But the suggestion that has been made will certainly accomplish the saving of the two hours to which I have alluded, and in that light is it not better than anything else that has been suggested?

Mr. BURNES. Will my friend from Georgia permit me to interrupt him for a correction?

Mr. BLOUNT. Of course, for a correction I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BURNES. I understand the gentleman to say that the two committees were not agreed as to the policy that should be pursued. The Committee on Appropriations is unanimously agreed that at 12 o'clock to-day this House shall adjourn and the Appropriations Committee shall have the floor, and that every effort shall be made for that purpose. The Appropriations Committee has no dissenting voice in it. We are perfectly unanimous that the best interests of the country and the best interest of legislation demand that the appropriation bills shall be proceeded with after 12 o'clock to-day.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not understand the gentleman to have made any correction of my remarks. On the contrary, it is manifest from his own statement that the disagreement I alluded to between the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and the Appropriations Committee does exist. The gentleman from Missouri announces that the Committee on Appropriations have agreed that they will endeavor to do a certain thing. That is but a committee composed of fifteen members. It will be necessary for the House to interpose to accomplish what they desire and to determine for itself which of the two bills shall have precedence in the order of consideration. I understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] to propose to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] to take the two hours this morning for the consideration of the river and harbor bill, and after that to let the House go on with the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill, which the gentleman from Kentucky declines to do. On the contrary, he proposes to go on until 12 o'clock perhaps, or until nearly 12 o'clock, or I believe his proposition is to go beyond 12, and then have a struggle as to which committee shall have recognition.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Which means an all-day fight.

Mr. BLOUNT. Which means, perhaps, as my friend from Pennsylvania suggests, an all-day fight. And if the Committee on Rivers and Harbors can not agree to take the two hours which the gentleman from Illinois proposes to concede to them, I think the members of this House outside of those committees should decide which of them shall have its business considered.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is called for. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND], which is that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. TOWNSHEND, there were ayes 36.

Before the negative vote was counted,.

Mr. HOLMAN called for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were ayes 19.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The affirmative, in the judgment of the Chair, is not a sufficient number to order the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOLMAN. Count the other side.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope business will not be delayed by the ordering of the yeas and nays.

The negative vote being counted, there were noes 67—the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the whole vote.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered, 46 members voting therefor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore appointed as tellers Mr. SPRINGER and Mr. TOWNSHEND.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 21, noes 76.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the whole vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND], who moves that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 53, nays 131, not voting 139; as follows:

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, the House having declared by a vote of three to one that its order shall be respected, I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I desire to ask if I have not misunderstood the Chair as deciding that if this debate should continue until one minute past 12, and the House should then adjourn, the effect would be to lose the session of Monday entirely.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not understand what decision the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] is attributing to the Chair.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I understood the Chair before the yea-and-nay vote was taken to say in answer to some gentleman upon the floor that if this debate should continue until one minute beyond 12 o'clock Monday's session would be lost.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair so decided.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, Then, pending the motion of my colleague [Mr. WILLIS] that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of discussing the river and harbor bill, I move that the House adjourn, so that we shall not lose Monday's session.

Mr. WILLIS. Is that in order, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] is in order.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. If this motion to adjourn is voted down, will it be competent for the committee after 12 o'clock to rise and determine whether it will consider the Post-Office appropriation bill or the river and harbor bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Most certainly it will. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] moves that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; pending which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] moves that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask if we can not have the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to agree——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has no authority to answer as to any agreement.

Mr. WILLIS. There is no agreement about it.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I withdraw my motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] withdraws his motion. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. HAMMOND in the chair), and resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 8130) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose on Saturday the pending question was upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] and the House was dividing by tellers. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] and the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] will please resume their places as tellers, and the Clerk will report the pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 20 insert:

"Provided, That no portion of said $150,000 shall be expended in the repair, erection, maintenance, or paving of levees, or in the grading or revetment of the banks of the Mississippi River owned by private parties or municipalities."

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 105.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next paragraph of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Aransas Pass and Bay, Texas: Continuing improvement, $100,000.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky.

The Clerk continued the reading, as follows:

Improving Brazos Santiago, Texas: Continuing improvement, $25,000.
Improving Passo Cavallo, Texas: Continuing improvement, $35,000.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the first paragraph read by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk has read two other paragraphs since that.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Yes; but he did so when I was trying to get the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] rose, and the Chair recognized him. He then entered into conversation with the gentleman on his right [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR], and the Clerk read on.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Which the Clerk had no right to do.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 212, insert the following:

"Provided, That no part of the money appropriated in this act shall be paid out for the purposes herein named until such payments shall be approved by the Attorney-General of the United States as legal and constitutional."

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. POST, of Pennsylvania. I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, reluctantly I rise to beg the indulgence of this committee. Not often have I claimed your attention; nor would I now did not the dictates of humanity require that some voice be raised in behalf of the much-maligned Committee on Rivers and Harbors. For them there is no couch of down, but each insatiate suitor for the people's coin upon their devoted heads pours forth the vials of his wrath. For days these gentlemen have been tortured and tormented by their associates with a relish and unction worthy of the cruelty inflicted by Parrhasius, the painter of Athens, upon the aged Olynthian captive. With attentive ears we have listened to their plaints. Analyzed, they amount only to the conflicting claims of rival discoverers. The hitherto undiscovered beauties and great possibilities of certain regions of our country as they are unfolded to us in the brilliant rhapsodies of gentlemen upon this floor having pet schemes to foster at the public expense are indeed most marvelous. By their fervid eloquence in defense of the old flag and an appropriation, swamp lands and barren deserts become fertile plains and blossom as the rose.

Shallow creeks and rivers whose elongated names are greater in extent, I ween, than the streams themselves, are made to appear as vast deeps upon, whose placid bosoms the commerce of the world might ride in majesty and still have room for more.

Hamlets as yet unnamed upon the maps flash upon the public notice with meteoric brilliancy, pictured as the future great trade centers of the country by the lurid oratory of the Representative who seeks a modicum of the redundant revenues wherewith to render himself more solid with his confiding constituents. [Laughter and applause.]

Historical, geographical, and scientific societies are ever and anon bestowing medals upon individuals for discoveries considered to be of value to the human family. Banquets are given, laudatory resolutions are passed, in fact eloquence runs riot in honor of men who by research, experiment, or exposure to the elements have added to the store of human knowledge.

Sir, the title to this bill is a misnomer. Instead of being an ordinary appropriation bill it is in reality a bill of discovery, and the paltry sums recommended to be expended thereon are in the nature of an inducement from some of these streams to remain with us all the year round rather than ascend heavenward in summer-time responsive to the blandishments of the sun's torrid heat.

I ask, Mr. Chairman, shall the Congress of the United States prove ungrateful to those of its membership who have, as recorded in this bill, rivaled the achievements of the most noted and eminent of the discoverers whose names have been inscribed upon the roll of fame? Be it not so. But rather let us pause and pay homage to the men who have rescued from oblivion and elevated to dignity of great national water ways diminutive rivers, which appear positively for the first time in this country, and for a limited season only (unless properly cared for, regardless of expense) in this wonderful aggregation brought together by the skill and untiring energy of our River and Harbor Committee. I appeal, therefore, to the members of this House to deal more tenderly with these deserving statesmen. Cease, I pray you, to revile them, and inveigh no more against their lack of capacity.

Is there one among you who has done for his country, for the cause of education, for posterity, anything so commendable, so grand or patriotic, as to have discovered the absolute necessity to the perpetuity of our institutions of improving the Withlacoochee River or the widening of Wappoo Cut? If not, then hold your peace.

Why, sir, some of the less thoughtful of our members have stood upon this floor and with wild gesticulations and in stentorian tones have complained because the members of this committee have held their sessions with closed doors and refused to be interrupted in their deliberations by the murmurings of the common herd, who were actuated only by mercenary motives, and who, like my loquacious friend from Saint Louis, sighed only for a fat slice of the "pork," as he heartlessly denominates this bill.

Is it unnatural that a body of men bent upon such a tremendous mission should withdraw themselves temporarily from the world, from the rude jostling of hungry suitors, that the serenity of their minds might not be disturbed by the jargon of the rabble?

THEIR LABORS ENDED.

Now behold the glorious work which they have wrought—a pamphlet bearing richest evidence of most profound erudition. I beg you to note in particular how the minutest detail has not been overlooked. We are not left to conjecture where rolls the Salkehatchie, or where the limpid Tchifuncte winds its tortuous way, nor yet where the gurgling waters of the Noxubee are wont to gurgle, but with conscientious precision we are told exactly which of the sisterhood of States possesses each of these great natural channels of transportation.

Imagine, Mr. Chairman, the irreparable loss to mankind if, as the grave and reverened signiors of this august committee were about to concentrate the power and ingenuity of their combined intellects to ascertain the source and course of the Chillysquawky River, the clamorous demand of the gentleman from Saint Louis "for a square divide" was to have thundered upon the declicately organized tympanums of their ears, or the irate gentleman from Wisconsin was to have flaunted the "bloody shirt" beneath their classic proboscides.

I shudder, sir, as I think of what might have been the disastrous results of so rude an interruption of the lucubrations of this noble band of public benefactors.

Having defended the committee as best I could in a general way I now desire to advert for a moment to a specific item in this bill.

Many have been the expressions of surprise and harsh have been the criticisms because of the large appropriation recommended for the improvement of Galveston harbor. Such strictures have been passed because of ignorance as to the matchless splendor, the magnetic power, the God-given advantages over all others of the city of Galveston. I hold in my hand a map printed in the Galveston Daily News, which shows beyond doubt that what Duluth was but a few years ago Galveston now is—the hub of the universe.

I confess, sir, that up to the moment that my desk was decorated with this all-convincing map, a reference to which demonstrates conclusively that the Creator intended that this great country should exist merely to pay tribute to the city of Galveston, I had entertained grave doubts as to the advisability of expending so much money in improving its harbor. Until my eyes rested upon this unanswerable chart, with the utmost nonchalance I would have voted ruthlessly to have stricken out the appropriation asked for, and viewed, without a twinge of remorse, the lamentations of its bereaved sponsors.

But all is now changed. As I gaze upon this map, frescoed so artistically, my soul is stirred to its deepest depths, and I am well-nigh persuaded to tap the fountain of our nation's wealth a la the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD], and permit the golden stream to gush forth unchecked to aid in furnishing a vent for the commerce which flows into Galveston with such ever-increasing force and volume.

Mark you, Mr. Chairman, how monarch-like, grand, gloomy, and peculiar, sits this metropolis of the sunny South; the waters of the Gulf coyly creeping in gentle wavelets to the shore, singing soft, sweet songs of adulation, and again, with boisterous billows piling mountain-high, rushing madly to be obsequiously prostrated at her feet, to bear the story of the myriad crafts that sail upon Old Ocean, and which seek in vain the honor of mooring at her wharves. Yet look again, and see that as the earth revolves around the sun, so the whole of creation revolves about this favored city and is but the halo which encircles the brow of the infinite.

This map grows upon me at every glance. See how, far away upon the golden shores of the Pacific, the people impatient long for an opportunity to shower in profusion into the lap of Galveston the wealth of precious metals and semi-tropical luxuries of that remote region!

Even the polygamous Mormons of Utah with feverish anxiety only desire the excuse of this appropriation when they, too, will render generous tribute to this modern Tyre.

Look whichever way you will, and there is visible a cord which binds the whole human family in closest sympathy with the welfare of Galveston. With such proof who can escape the conviction that upon the fate of this item hang the hopes, the fears, the happiness, and future prosperity of millions of souls who breathlessly await the action of this House. Who knows but in the fate of this item also hangs trembling in the balance the ultimate destiny of our nation.

If what is here delineated be true, in my mind's eye I see the dread results of a failure to respond favorably to this demand. Methinks even now I hear the wail of distress that will come up from Galveston, and which, according to the indications upon this map, will be echoed along the far western coast and re-echoed through the cavernous depths of the Yosemite.

Deny this boon, and the winds, as they sway the forests of the great Northwest, will moan piteously over the sad fate of this stupendous project; the overflowing granaries of the Southwest will burst with indignation, while the very heavens will frown with fiercest displeasure. At least I should judge so according to the map.

Mr. Chairman, imagine the anguish of soul I suffer with these convictions pressing upon my conscience, these lofty thoughts agitating my mind, and these emotions welling up in my bosom, to think that by my vote I can not assist in forwarding this humanitarian enterprise because of a craven fear of being held to an account therefor by those whom I represent upon this floor.

Recently in a formal manner they requested me to quit public life after the 4th of March and return to their loving embrace, having elected another whom they could better spare than me for this work. They don't understand this matter. They have not seen this map, and, in their benighted state, should I vote for this item, it might dampen the ardor of their love for me and throw a coldness over the meeting when I go home. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. WILLIS. I ask for a vote on this proposition.

Mr. POST, of Pennsylvania. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I move the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Vicksburg Harbor, under the direction of the Secretary of War, $250,000.

Mr. BARKSDALE. A great statesman, not a resident of the Mississippi Valley, but of the Atlantic coast, in advocating the claims of the Mississippi River to protection by the General Government, properly denominated it as an inland sea. Vicksburg Harbor is third in importance to all others on the Mississippi River between Cairo and its mouth. It has a commerce of $11,000,000. It is situated at the base of the Yazoo delta, embracing a region of two hundred and fifty miles in length and seventy-five miles in width, unexampled for its fertility either in this country or any other on the face of the globe. It lies on the line of two great transcontinental railways, one the most direct route from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and the other extending from Newport News to San Francisco by way of Louisville, Memphis, Vicksburg, and New Orleans. It is the entrepôt, or the trade center, of a large portion of the agricultural region of the Northwest. There millions of dollars' worth of products are received and distributed throughout the interior. Hence, Mr. Chairman, it is not a local improvement I am asking an appropriation for; it is to promote a commerce in which not less than two-thirds of the States are directly interested.

Now, sir, I have no reproaches for the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. They have performed their work faithfully. Within this short session it was literally impossible for them to hear the arguments of delegations from the several States in advocacy of the various objects proposed for improvement, but they have been addressed in writing by members and others who have felt it their duty to be heard by the committee. An address, signed by the Senators and a portion of the Representatives from Mississippi, presenting the claims of Vicksburg and other harbors of the Mississippi River within the limits of the State, has been presented to the committee, and, while its recommendations have not been accepted, there is reason to believe that it has been at least respectfully considered. From that portion of the address which relates to the harbor of Vicksburg I will submit the following extract:

The recommendation for Vicksburg Harbor is so insignificant in amount that we conclude that as to that necessary, even essential improvement, the commission is unwilling to undertake it without the direction of Congress. And this surmise receives support from the published declarations of at least one member of the commission. Certainly the commission do not mean to say that only $20,000 is needed to restore a safe and convenient harbor for the city of Vicksburg, as every one at all conversant with the subject knows that the sum recommended is wholly inadequate for that purpose. We infer that the commission means that they intend only to preserve the present status of that point by preventing a further recession of the river from caving on the opposite bank. This means to abandon that important city, and to turn over the immense interests there to destruction. Against this we most solemnly protest. The amount needed to restore that harbor, though very considerable, is yet much smaller than Congress has granted to harbors in other States. And there is nothing which can justify this discrimination against Vicksburg and the State of Mississippi. The interests involved are not too insignificant to demand the favorable action of Congress or of your honorable body. These interests are not merely local, but are of great importance to the State, and in fact to a large section of the Union.

Vicksburg is the most important point on the river (except Memphis and Natchez) between Saint Louis and New Orleans. It has a population of 15,000, which would have been largely greater but for the neglect of the national authorities in restoring this harbor. The real estate in Vicksburg is now worth more than $4,000,000, and this is to be destroyed if the harbor is not restored. There are situated there two large compresses on which cotton is pressed for shipment to New England and Europe. There are several large wholesale houses, as well as a great number of retail establishments. The largest cotton-seed-oil mill in the world is also there, and another of considerable size. There are also three large foundries, an ice factory, and a furniture and general woodenware factory. Many large lumber mills, with planing, turning, and grooving mills, and sash and blind factories attached. There are also situated there the large workshops of the Vicksburg and Meridian Railroad, which has its wstern terminus there. Vicksburg is also the commercial terminus of the Vicksburg, Shreveport and Pacific Railroad, which ends on the western bank of the river, opposite the city, and is connected therewith by a steam ferry. The largest national cemetery (except one) in the Union is situated there. It is the coaling station, as well as the depot for ice and other supplies, of all the steamers that ply on the Mississippi River, every one of which use the harbor in passing up and down the river. The Louisville, New Orleans and Texas Railroad, which connects New Orleans with Newport News, Va., passes through the city, and there connects with the other railroads above mentioned and with the Mississippi River.

We have no specific statistics as to the commerce, but we can give some idea of its magnitude now and its immense proportions in the near future, if Congress will only discharge its plain duty by restoring the harbor.

The city is situated at (just below) the mouth of Yazoo River, which with its tributaries, the Tallahatchie, Coldwater, Yazoo Pass, Yallabusha, Rolling Fork, Sunflower, Deer Creek, Steele's Bayou, Silver Creek, Bear Creek, all navigable streams, traverse a country than which there is no other on earth more fertile, or richer in natural resources. It is the entrance to the Yazoo delta and the doorway through which its productions, now already immense, and soon, with the levees restored, to arise to enormous proportions, go into the commerce of the world. Vicksburg is the home port of a large fleet of small steamers which navigate these streams, traversing and reaching every part of the great delta. It is the northern terminus of a line of steamers from New Orleans, the most magnificent that ply on the Western waters. It is also the home of a large number of steamers plying between Natchez and that point and the bends above and below, and is the southern terminus of a tri-weekly line of steamers running between that port and Saint Louis and all intervening points. By rail it has direct connection with New Orleans, with Memphis, and all cities north of it, and with Meridian and Jackson, both of which are railroad centers. And at these points it gets connection with the whole Union. By the Mississippi River it gets the cheap freights of water transportation, and by the small rivers above mentioned and its various railroad connections distributes these cheap rates throughout the State. By this connection with the great river the State has the regulating influence of that stream on freights.

We do not go too far when we assert that if the harbor be restored, Vicksburg is destined soon to be one of the most important cities in the Southwest, and if this be neglected, there will be a great retrogression and loss, and little chance of progress.

For these cogent reasons I appeal to the judgment of Congress from the report of the Mississippi River Commission, and from the bill reported by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, in behalf of this important harbor. Shall it be preserved to the commerce of the country, or shall it be doomed, by niggardly parsimony, to destruction?

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. OATES took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed the following bills, with amendments; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

A bill (H. R. 5800) for the relief of Sarah B. Jackson; and

A bill (H. R. 8039) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes.

Also, that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested, namely:

A bill (S. 1300) to authorize the President to restore Tenedore Ten Eyck to his former rank in the Army, and to place him upon the retired-list of Army officers.

The message further announced that the Senate insists on its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives to the bill (H. R. 3258) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Saint Croix River at the most accessible point between Stillwater and Taylor's Falls, Minn., and agreed to the conference asked by the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Messrs. CONGER, MCMILLAN, and VEST as conferees on the part of the Senate.

Also, that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 729) for the protection of children in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Also, that the President pro tempore of the Senate had appointed Messrs. HOAR and PENDLETON tellers on the part of the Senate for the purpose of counting the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

In seconding the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi for this appropriation I desire to say that I believe if there is an amendment that could be made to this measure which would have intrinsic merit it is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi, and now pending before this committee.

The harbor of Vicksburg is a clear and very distinct illustration of the harbors on the Mississippi River. It illustrates the fact that these harbors can be destroyed by the current of that stream. The Government has been for ten or fifteen years past operating extensive works to maintain the harbor at Vicksburg. This bill has unfortunately left that harbor out and made no provision for it. Those works must suffer and that harbor must suffer still further from the neglect of Congress in making an appropriation for it. The works have already cost a large sum of money. If there is no provision now made for their continuance and maintenance they must in a large degree perish. To complete them will require comparatively a small sum in addition to what has been already expended, and if they are once finished they will be permanent in their character, and require but little expenditure in the way of repairs in future.

Mr. Chairman, the city of Vicksburg is not a mere way-point on that great river. It is the most important city between New Orleans and Memphis. It is a point at which several important railroads converge. It is a point where one of the most important lines across the continent passes the river—the Southern Pacific road, as it used to be named, now the Vicksburg, Shreveport and Pacific Railroad—one of the important transcontinental lines. On the opposite side of the river there are very important works being prosecuted by the Mississippi River Commission for the improvement of the river itself. I only desire to add here, therefore, that if it be possible for the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to reconsider their action on this point I trust they will do so, and allow the appropriation suggested by the gentleman from Mississippi, for the purpose indicated by him, to go into the bill.

Mr. WILLIS. I call for a vote.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. JEFFORDS. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. WILLIS. I appeal to the friends of this bill to let us get along as fast as we can. As business men I appeal to them.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, I am as earnestly a friend of this river and harbor bill as the chairman of this committee, and I ask to be heard for a few moments on this important measure. I have been endeavoring to be heard. Vicksburg is in my district and, as I think this question is presented, I should have the privilege of being heard briefly upon the subject.

Sir, I know that it is impossible for the committee to frame an ideal river and harbor bill. That can never be done until all the navigable waters of the United States are embraced in one bill and the amounts to be given for the improvement of the navigable waters of the United States equitably distributed between all localities. Then you will have an ideal river and harbor bill.

I do not question the motives of the committee, nor do I rise for the purpose of arraigning them for the bill which they have reported. I do, however, disagree with the allotments and the apportionments that have been made under this bill.

Some statements, sir, have been made here in the course of this debate which if left unchallenged would create a false impression, and would establish a rule that would be detrimental to the interests of rivers and inland harbors. It has been asserted here that these harbors on the Mississippi River are mere steamboat landings; that they are not harbors. Where is the authority for any such declaration as that? I grant you, sir, that from the organization of the Government in 1783 down to 1851, when the decision in the Genesee Chief case was pronounced, the fresh-water rivers and lakes were not regarded as within the admiralty jurisdiction of the United States; but since that decision every square inch of navigable water belonging to the United States is subject to the admiralty jurisdiction of the United States and to the jurisdiction of Congress in making appropriations for the improvement of the rivers and harbors of all our inland navigable waters.

Let me say to those gentlemen who represent the lakes and the Western rivers that if this doctrine is to be established, that the landings or harbors, as they have always been called, on the Mississippi are not harbors and are not subject to the jurisdiction of the United States simply because they are upon fresh water instead of the open sea, that will allow a precedent to be established which will strike down the improvement of the rivers and harbors on the lakes and the rivers. It would be a dangerous thing to allow this thing to be done.

So far as this improvement of the Vicksburg Harbor is concerned there is an estimate. The Mississippi River Commission have estimated $20,000 for the improvement of Vicksburg Harbor or Delta Point, which is a part of the harbor.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. DINGLEY. I take the floor and yield my time to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIS. I object. I again appeal to the friends of this bill to let us go on.

Mr. JEFFORDS. I can get in after a while, and the gentleman might as well let me finish now.

Mr. WILLIS. If the gentleman is a friend of this bill——

Mr. JEFFORDS. I am a friend of it.

Mr. WILLIS. I know he is.

Mr. JEFFORDS. I am willing to do what I can to pass the bill.

Mr. WILLIS. It is because the gentleman is a friend of the bill that I appeal to him.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move to strike out the last word. I was recognized, as I understand, by the Chair. I yield my time to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. JEFFORDS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. JEFFORDS] is entitled to the floor and can not be taken off it. If the gentleman from Kentucky desires it the Chair will afterward recognize him for a motion that the committee rise for the purpose of limiting debate.

Mr. JEFFORDS. I will say to the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors that some of the friends of this bill insist it shall be amended. Instead of being an injury to the bill, it is a benefit to the bill to have its friends propose to amend and perfect it. The committee ought to listen to their friends. As I said, I have no disposition to criticise their action, for I know that they have done the best that they possibly could, or what they thought or believed was for the best.

I desire, Mr. Chairman, to know why New Orleans was put in this bill, while Natchez, Vicksburg, Greenville, Memphis, Hickman, and Columbus are all left out? The gentlemen say because New Orleans is a seaport or something of that kind. The Mississippi River is navigable from the sea almost to its headwaters, and if New Orleans is a harbor, then Natchez and Vicksburg and these other points are harbors also. Why this discrimination? Why has this historic and heroic city of Vicksburg been denied the pitiful sum of $20,000, which is included in the estimates made by the Mississippi River Commission? I again ask why this discrimination against this spot? If ever a time comes when American valor is to be commemorated by a monument erected to the heroism of American soldiers, and by this I mean the soldiers of both sides, the fittest place in all this land for such a monument will be the city of Vicksburg. The river having left it some two miles, this city appeals to Congress, appeals to the nation to save her harbor. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors see fit to ignore that appeal and to refuse this small appropriation of $20,000 even, that is for the purpose of maintaining and preserving that harbor and holding the work already constructed by the Government.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. May I ask the gentleman whether the Chief of Engineers has made a recommendation in favor of an appropriation?

Mr. JEFFORDS. The Mississippi River Commission does so. It is in the report of the Chief of Engineers, which embraces the report of the Mississippi River Commission, and they recommend this as much as they have recommended any other matter that is in the bill. They have recommended this appropriation of $20,000; and yet this city of such great historic renown is discriminated against in favor of the greater city of New Orleans. I trust the amendment of my colleague will be adopted.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JEFFORDS. I ask leave to extend my remarks as printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, it is well known that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, on account, as they said, of the shortness of the session, declined to hear oral arguments from any one; but they courteously agreed to receive and consider arguments and memorials in writing. Availing ourselves of this permission, our Senators and the Representatives more immediately representing the river districts submitted to the committee the following memorial, which, as it embodies more clearly than anything I can now say arguments in favor of appropriations for the benefit of these river harbors, I herewith submit as part of my remarks for the consideration of this committee and of the country:

WASHINGTON, January 10, 1885.

To the honorable the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives:

GENTLEMEN: Returning you our thanks for the courtesy extended in the promise to receive any suggestions we might see proper to submit in writing in relation to appropriations for rivers and harbors on the Mississippi River, we now proceed to submit this insufficient statement on that subject.

We regret that the time of the committee will not allow of the delay necessary to enable us to get a copy of the last report of the Mississippi River Commission, now in the hands of the Printer. Not having seen that paper, we have no other information of the recommendations of the commission than short abstracts relating solely to the amounts estimated, such as have been published in the press. We learn in this way that the commission recommends $20,000 for the work on the Vicksburg Harbor, $186,000 for Greenville, and $700,000 for Natchez. With the estimates for Natchez and Greenville we make no complaint, but join with the commission in their recommendation, and ask, for the reasons hereinafter to be stated, that these amounts be severally allotted to these harbors.

The recommendation for Vicksburg Harbor is so insignificant in amount that we conclude that as to that necessary, even essential, improvement the commission is unwilling to undertake it without the direction of Congress. And this surmise receives support from the published declarations of at least one member of the commission. Certainly the commission do not mean to say that only $20,000 is needed to restore a safe and convenient harbor for the city of Vicksburg, as every one at all conversant with the subject knows that the sum recommended is wholly inadequate for that purpose. We infer that the commission means that they intend only to preserve the present status of that point by preventing a further recession of the river from caving on the opposite bank. This means to abandon that important city, and to turn over the immense interests there to destruction. Against this we most solemnly protest. The amount needed to restore that harbor, though very considerable, is yet much smaller than Congress has granted to harbors in other States. And there is nothing which can justify this discrimination against Vicksburg and the State of Mississippi. The interests involved are not too insignificant to demand the favorable action of Congress or of your honorable body. These interests are not merely local, but are of great importance to the State, and in fact to a large section of the Union.

Vicksburg is the most important point on the river (except Memphis and Natchez) between Saint Louis and New Orleans. It has a population of 15,000, which would have been largely greater but for the neglect of the national authorities in restoring this harbor. The real estate in Vicksburg is now worth more than $4,000,000, and this is to be destroyed if the harbor is not restored. There are situated there two large compresses, on which cotton is pressed for shipment to New England and Europe. There are several large wholesale houses, as well as a great number of retail establishments. The largest cotton-seed-oil mill in the world is also there, and another of considerable size. There are also three large foundries, an ice factory, and a furniture and general woodenware factory; also many large lumber mills, with planing, turning, and grooving mills, and sash and blind factories attached. There are also situated there the large workshops of the Vicksburg and Meridian Railroad, which has its western terminus there. Vicksburg is also the commercial terminus of the Vicksburg, Shreveport and Pacific Railroad, which ends on the western bank of the river opposite the city, and is connected therewith by a steam-ferry, The largest national cemetery (except one) in the Union is situated there. It is the coaling station, as well as the depot for ice and other supplies, of all the steamers that ply on the Mississippi River, every one of which uses the harbor in passing up and down the river. The Louisville, New Orleans and Texas Railroad, which connects New Orleans with Newport News, Va., passes through the city, and there connects with the other railroads above mentioned and with the Mississippi River.

We have no specific statistics as to the commerce, but we can give some idea of its magnitude now, and its immense proportions in the near future, if Congress will only discharge its plain duty by restoring the harbor.

The city is situated at (just below) the mouth of Yazoo River, which with its tributaries, the Tallahatchie, Coldwater, Yazoo Pass, Yallabusha, Rolling Fork, Sunflower, Deer Creek, Steele's Bayou, Silver Creek, Bear Creek, all navigable streams, traverse a country than which there is no other on earth more fertile or richer in natural resources. It is the entrance to the Yazoo delta and the doorway through which its productions—now already immense, and soon, with the levees restored, to arise to enormous proportions—go into the commerce of the world. Vicksburg is the home port of a large fleet of small steamers which navigate these streams, traversing and reaching every part of the great delta. It is the northern terminus of a line of steamers from New Orleans, the most magnificent that ply on the Western waters. It is also the home of a large number of steamers plying between Natchez and that point and the bends above and below, and is the southern terminus of a tri-weekly line of steamers running between that port and Saint Louis and all intervening points. By rail it has direct connections with New Orleans, with Memphis and all cities north of it, and with Meridian and Jackson, both of which are railroad centers. And at these points it gets connection with the whole Union. By the Mississippi River it gets the cheap freights of water transportation, and by the small rivers above mentioned and its various railroad connections distributes these cheap rates throughout the State. By this connection with the great river the State has the regulating influence of that stream on freights.

We do not go too far when we assert that if the harbor be restored Vicksburg is destined soon to be one of the most important cities in the Southwest, and if this be neglected, there will be a great retrogression and loss and little chance of progress.

We desire here to call attention to the necessity of Greenville for a specific allotment of the amount estimated by the commission. Greenville is already a flourishing and important city. It is the county seat of the largest cotton-producing county in the world. It has a railroad connection by the Georgia Pacific for a considerable distance south, which road penetrates the richest country in the Southwest. It has, by the same road, a connection east with the Sunflower River, on which is situated a large district of the richest lands in the Yazoo delta. When this road is completed to Columbus, in Northeast Mississippi, it will have direct connection with Birmingham, Ala., and Atlanta, Ga., and all the roads coming to these important cities, besides cross connections with these great lines of roads running from the West to New Orleans, Mobile, and Texas. It also has connection by a branch with the New Orleans, Louisville and Texas Railroad.

A year ago Colonel Percy, a citizen of Mississippi, addressed this committee in behalf of the claims of Greenville, and introduced many interesting statistics pertaining to the city. He also advanced arguments and reasons in favor of preserving the harbor. We understand these remain among the archives of the committee, and we ask that the committee will examine them again and give them the weight their importance demands. The harbor is now caving, and the very existence of the city is threatened. And here we may be permitted to add that Greenville is the only important town in the Yazoo delta, except Yazoo City, which is at the base of the hills. This delta is, to the extent of three-fourths of the whole number, inhabited by the colored race. The whites are few. The necessity of maintaining a town of considerable size, in which the whites predominate, in this district, is too obvious to need comment. We mention only that the conservative influence of the town in the past has been found of the greatest importance in preserving good order and safe local government in this district.

In connection with what we submit in relation to the Vicksburg and Greenville harbors we desire to add something in relation to the Yazoo delta. It will be remembered that Vicksburg is at the southern end of the delta, and is the natural water outlet of its productions, while Greenville is about the center of the delta, north and south, though on its western boundary. That both of these cities are destined soon to be of immense importance is evident. This delta contains over 4,000,000 acres of the finest land in the world. It is in the center of the cotton belt; as you go north or south of it, the cold on the one hand and the heat on the other renders cotton cultivation less successful. In this delta is found every favoring condition for the cultivation and production of this great staple, besides being well adapted to the production of corn, oats, potatoes, and other food. The delta of the Nile is less than 6,000,000 acres, and on its bosom were supported immense populations and the greatest cities of the world. The Yazoo delta is five-sixths as large as the Nile delta. It is equally as fertile. It is dominated and occupied by the most progressive race on earth. From its rich soil can come and will come more cotton than is now produced in the whole Union. It will also be of longer staple and greater strength. It is now almost wholly undeveloped, not more than one-twelfth (if so much) of its area being in cultivation. The levees have been built at great expense, and it may be considered that from now henceforth the delta will be exempt from destructive floods. As soon as it shall be ascertained and recognized that security from overflows is attained, there will be a speedy settlement of the whole delta. This large population thus secured and their immense productions will depend upon two cities for commercial marts. It is impossible to be extravagant as to what will be the outcome.

In addition, we desire to press a most important consideration on the committee. This land has been so favored by nature for agriculture, giving such ease and freedom in rural work, and the consequent extreme facility for acquiring independence by farming, and the obstacles there existing to successful manufacturing, such as want of coal and water power, will prevent the establishment of manufactures to any large extent in this delta. The great population which it will contain will be consumers of the products of the other sections of the Union. They will continue to buy their horses, mules, meat, flour, lard, and other provisions and agricultural implements from the West; and their dry goods, clothing, and other necessaries and their luxuries must come from the East. The whole or nearly the whole of their immense cotton production will be spent in interstate commerce, which, being free, will benefit both sides. This is the certain result in the near future. In view of this, it would be the greatest of all follies to refuse to improve these harbors, which are the means by which and through which this great commerce shall be carried on. These two cities will grow to be of importance if Congress will only allow to them, as it allows to all other cities, that aid in the way of harbor improvements necessary for commerce. And, in relation to Vicksburg, we trust we will be pardoned for adding that from its natural advantages it has been and still is the surest hope of the State for a large commercial city. As yet the State is without one. Vicksburg is situated about midway between its northern and southern border. It has the water and railroad connections and the splendid country for support we have hereinbefore pointed out. In view of these facts, a failure to restore her harbor, the abandonment of her fortunes, as seems to be proposed by the Mississippi River Commission, would be a fatal blow to the State. We can not think the committee will be a party to its infliction.

The claim of Natchez is equally great. It is the oldest city in the State. It has long been the seat of wealth and refinement. It is now and always has been the center of a flourishing commerce. It has recently become a considerable manufacturing point. It has taken a lead in an industry so necessary to the development of the South. Already two large cotton mills are in operation. It has an extensive commerce with the back country in Mississippi and on the banks of the river both above and below. It has also a large commerce west by a railroad running in that direction. It has connection by a railroad built mainly by its own capital and that of the country through which it runs with Jackson, which is a railroad center. Arrangements have been completed to make this road of standard gauge, and to extend it to Columbus, Miss. This extension, now certain to be made in a very short time, will connect Natchez with the prairie section of the State, a very large district, only surpassed in richness by the Yazoo delta. We might say more on this subject, but as the Mississippi River Commission, as we learn from the press, has recommended $700,000 for this harbor, we deem it unnecessary. We insist earnestly that this sum be granted. If they should be longer delay the cost of the work will be augmented, and it may amount to a sum so great as to make it difficult to obtain the proper appropriation from Congress. Maps and papers were laid before your committee last session by Judge Van Eaton, Representative of that district, showing great and immediate danger of the river so changing its course as utterly to ruin the harbor, and to which we now ask your attention. This danger is as imminent now as ever, in fact more so, but this is shown by what we hear is the recommendation of the river commission asking as above $700,000 for Natchez Harbor. Since the war the citizens of Natchez have shown much commendable public spirit in the building of the railroad and cotton factories above referred to. Also cotton-seed-oil mills, iron factories, and various other manufacturing interests. All of which, as well as the city, are likely to be utterly ruined unless Congress acts very speedily.

We desire now to enter our most solemn protest against leaving the improvement of these three harbors to the sole discretion of the Mississippi River Commission. The harbors in other sections of the country are provided for specifically by Congress, fixing the amount which shall be given to each. There is no necessary connection between channel improvements and the improvements of these harbors, so as to require that a gross sum shall be given for both harbor and river improvement, leaving it to the Mississippi River Commission to make the allotment of the separate shares of each.

The commission makes its estimates yearly; Congress never grants but a small per centum of the amount. The commission finds itself without the necessary means to do the work needed. It is compelled to select the work which it deems the most important. It has so happened that in making this selection it has failed to give a dollar to Natchez or Greenville, and also practically nothing to Vicksburg. Thus the interest of these cities of the State of Mississippi have been sacrificed. The insufficient sum granted for channel improvements has been eked out by taking what is due to these harbors. In this manner Mississippi's interests have been sacrificed to the interest of other sections. Her quota of the funds for harbor improvements has been taken for other purposes. It is no answer to this just complaint to say that this is necessary to the harmony and symmetry of the system adopted for the improvement of the Mississippi River. If that were true, then the system is unjust, and should be abandoned or modified. We ask no modification of the system except that Congress shall give enough to do the work of harbor and also channel improvement, and that it shall express its will that the one shall not be sacrificed to the other.

We desire with the emphasis coming from a consciousness of past wrong done to our State and people to urge the committee to look into the matters of this communication, with the determination to right the wrong perpetrated; to do equal and impartial justice to all interests involved, and not to allow themselves to be hampered and restrained by seeking a harmony and symmetry in systems of expenditure not needed for the perfection of the work to be accomplished, and unattainable but by the sacrifice of great interests, and which heretofore has only had the effect to impede and to bind a just exercise of river and harbor improvement in Mississippi in a narrow and inflexible technicality. We ask that the sums respectively recommended by the commission for the harbors of Greenville and Natchez be specifically allotted to them in the bill which the committee shall frame, and in like manner that the sum of $500,000 be allotted for the improvement of the harbor at Vicksburg.

We of the Mississippi Valley believe we have just cause to complain that whenever we have asked for appropriations we have been met as if we were mendicants seeking a charity of the Government, when we are really but demanding our just dues.

It perhaps is not generally known that the Government received a gross income of about $6,000,000 for the year ending June 30, 1884, derived from steamboats and other vessels engaged in the carrying trade of the Mississippi and its navigable tributaries. This vast sum is made up of steamboat fees, assessments on the tonnage of vessels, licenses to captains, pilots, and others connected with, or engaged in the trade and commerce of, the rivers of the great Mississippi Valley. The gross sum thus received, estimating the receipts at $6,000,000, for the past twenty years, would reach the enormous sum of $120,000,000. For the year ending June 30, 1884, after paying all fees, salaries, and expenses, the Government derived a net income of $1,513,713.99, and which for a period of twenty years, assuming this to be a fair average, would yield a net aggregate for that period of $30,274,279.80.

It does not seem to me as if we ought to be treated as beggars when we who contribute so much to the support of the Government ask that a portion of what we contribute may be returned to us for the purpose of increasing our facilities in conducting the commerce of this great country.

Is it presumptuous for us to ask some aid from the Government in such a cause and in behalf of such interests?

Mr. Chairman, it is my conviction that of all appropriations for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River one-third should be devoted to channel and harbor improvements and two-thirds to the erection and maintenance of levees.

Channel improvements, in my opinion, should mainly consist in removing snags and obstructions. If levees are erected and maintained so as to confine the river at flood-tide within the banks of the levees, the river will in the course of time change its habits and correct most of its present eccentricities. This is the theory of the River Commission. It is evident to any fair-minded person that six of the seven river commissioners give the preference to the levees over any other method of improvement. They specially emphasize the advantages and benefits to be derived from the construction of levees. I call attention to the following extract taken from the report of the river commission, to be found on pages 13 to 20, inclusive, Executive Document No. 64, second session Forty-eighth Congress:

LEVEES AND OUTLETS.

The difficulties of navigation on the Mississippi River below the mouth of the Missouri at no time arises from want of volume.

During the flood stages the supply is of course ample; and it is equally true that if the volume of discharge of even the lowest stages were constant, it would develop, in time, a sufficient channel for navigation.

Where the increases of width and area of section have become so excessive as to have seriously impaired navigation, scour and fill are less the result of absolute velocity than of the relative velocities in adjacent sections. In such cases the narrow and deep parts have greater areas of section, and therefore lesser velocities in the lower stages; while the wider and bar-obstructed sections at that period have lesser areas and greater velocities. At higher stages this relation is reversed.

An increment to the bars accompanies the flood because in the sections where they form there is greater area and less velocity than in the pool sections above. This subject is discussed by Mr. R. E. McMath (Report Mississippi River Commission, 1881, Appendix K, page 242).

This condition is not a necessary result of the flood in a regulated river, but rather of those irregularities of the water way the correction of which constitutes an essential part of the plan of improvement projected by the commission. With equal widths there should be no such interchanges of velocity at adjacent sections in high and low stages, and no differences of depth and area except at reversion points, where less resistance makes lesser sectional dimensions equally efficient. A certain result of such uniformity of the elements of area as has always been insisted on by the commission will be the correction of this local bar building by the flood.

To this bar growth at high stages there is a logical limit. When it has progressed far enough to maintain, by contraction, the velocity of approach from above, it necessarily ceases. This is true as long as the volume of discharge finds no other means of escape outside the bed of the stream. But when such opportunity is afforded, the bar growth is unchecked as long as a line of resistance is open through the outlet. In the case of a cut-off the entire river is deflected in the direction of the increased slope through the new bed, and within a year or two the abandoned channel is entirely closed.

Now, "when we consider that the slope of the river along its proper course averages scarcely one-third foot to the mile, while the banks slope away from the river four to ten feet to the mile, it is easy to see to what an extent, during floods, the river is tempted to change its course," and that in such proportion as this temptation prevails, an effect similar to that of a cut-off in building a bar across the depleted channel is produced.

As the direction of the surface slope affects the direction of the thread of motion of the stream to all depths, so in case of both cut-off and crevasse the stream is turned, involving a loss of power in the impact against the bank, continuity of motion is broken, velocity is reduced, and a source of bar-formation is introduced. In the case of the crevasse, by the loss of volume loss of velocity and ultimately of section is also incurred.

All plans proposed for the improvement of the river have for a common aim the establishment of uniform conditions at the same stages. As these conditions are interdependent, the securing of any one will tend to bring about the others. Thus uniform section will give uniform mean velocity, which in turn will induce greater uniformity of channel depth at any given stage. But, as an element of uniform section, the importance of uniform width by itself as a factor in producing uniform velocity is lessened so long as the escape of water from and return to the river over banks varying twenty feet in height, as referred to the flood slope, allow inequality of flood velocity and depth as great as results from the present unequal widths.

Variation of discharge, at the same flood stage, in alternating parts of the river, from 1,000,000 to 1,600,000 cubic feet per second, is as much an obstacle to stability of regimen as the existing difference of width; and improvement is only attainable by the control of both the area and discharge.

Uniformity of bank grade, therefore, as an element of uniformity of section and velocity and channel depths, assumes the same importance as uniformity of width, and should be extended and maintained over the entire length of the alluvial river.

The present grade of the banks with reference to its earlier and normal conditions is discussed in Appendix F, page 122, report Mississippi River Commission, 1881. The levees as heretofore built, or as now recommended, can not justly be considered as superimposed on, or added to, what would have been the bank height when carried unchecked to its natural limit; but as establishing, by artificial means, a grade which the river in the free exercise of its functions is ever seeking to attain, and to which, under normal conditions, it has approximated.

All observations bearing on this subject made by the commission sustain these views. In 1862 a break known as "Cubitt's Gap" occurred in the left bank of the river, about four miles above the head of the passes. It rapidly enlarged, until its section was about 34 per cent. that of the main river. The locality was surveyed in 1868, 1872, 1875, 1876, and 1877 by the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey. So we have a full physical history of the changes, which are thus stated by Mr. Marinden, assistant in charge of the surveys:

"A noticeable feature in front of the 'gap,' and one which in a great measure must be traced to it as its cause, is the formation of a flat on the west bank, as shown by the deep contours—the 24-foot curve more especially. Starting at a point on the west shore 3,000 feet above the 'gap,' where all the curves run parallel to the shore, and the 24-foot curve is two hundred and sixty feet from the 3-foot curve, which I have taken as the reference for convenience, being smoother than the shore-line, although running parallel to it, the 24-foot contour abruptly juts out towards the center of the river, till opposite the north point of the 'gap' it is eight hundred and twenty feet from the 3-foot curve; then following downstream and opposite the south point it is nine hundred and twenty feet; then after passing the opening of Cubitt's Gap it retreats toward the shore-line, so that about 2,000 feet below the south point it is seven hundred and sixty feet; 4,000 feet below it is seven hundred and twenty feet off, and 8,000 feet below the 'gap' it is only five hundred feet off, notwithstanding the gradual expansion of the Mississippi, which at the upper limit is 3,720 feet wide, and at the lower limit, 8,000 feet below the 'gap,' it is 4,815 feet in width, as measured between the 3-foot curve of each bank.

"From the south point for a distance of about 1,300 feet down-stream the two surveys compared are one of 1866, and the other 1876, which give a mean shoaling of 1.6 feet in the ten years, or 0.16 foot per year.

"From the above-mentioned limit, 1,306 feet below the south point of 'gap' to Cubitt's House, we have two surveys for comparison, one executed in 1866 by Assistant Gerdes, and the other by my party in 1877, giving an interval of eleven years; over this space there has been a mean shoaling of 3.9 feet, or 0.39 foot per year.

"From Cubitt's House to the head of the passes, including all the space now covered by the works for the improvement of the channel-way into South Pass, we have two surveys again; one of 1866 by Assistant Gerdes, and one done under my direction in 1875 by Subassistant Braid. These surveys show a decrease in depth of 3.6 feet in nine years, or 0.4 foot each year. Where, however, the present jettied channel into South Pass is located, there has been a decided deepening."

A subsequent survey, under the direction of the commission, indicates the continued progress of this deterioration of the channel, which already threatens serious consequences to the maritime commerce of New Orleans.

The great loss of section, extending many miles below Malone's, Riverton, Bolivar, and Mound Place, and consequent upon these crevasses in 1882; and also the enlargement of the low-water section below Bonnet Carré, caused by the closing of this crevasse in the same year, were fully described in the last annual report of the commission (1883, page 16, and Appendix D, part 4, page 171).

That such results are not only local but cumulative—throughout long reaches—is also indicated by observations. The gauge records of flood heights and the knowledge of facts connected with them are not extended or complete enough to possess full authority. But if Memphis and Natchez are respectively selected as locations characteristic of unleveed and leveed fronts, and the existing record at each point divided into two parts covering equal time periods and the means compared, it shows that the floods along the unleveed fronts have become greater during the latter half of the time covered by the record, while for the same relative time along leveed fronts they have been less. As there is no doubt of the increase, during this time, of one factor of sectional area—width—any tendency to greater flood heights along unleveed fronts means a more than proportionate decrease of the depth. The reverse of this is the apparent inference along the leveed front.

These two points, Memphis and Natchez, have been selected as fairly representative, having the longest records (57 and 82 years, respectively), and being least affected by conditions not under consideration. An examination of the adjacent gauge records does not conflict with the inference drawn from those cited.

Again, the greater oscillation between high and low water at the mouth of the tributaries than at intermediate points has long been observed. It is presented here in tabulated form for the gauge stations at the mouths, and one intermediately located. It is represented graphically for all gauge stations in Plate No. I.

Location.	Extreme.	Mean of last five years.
Cairo, mouth of Ohio	53.17	43.48
Fulton, intermediate	34.55	30.13
Helena, mouth of Saint Francis	47.20	38.57
Malone's, intermediate	34.05	33.91
Mouth White River	48.40	40.06
Lake Providence, intermediate	40.90	32.91
Vicksburg, mouth of Yazoo	51.10	39.85
Natchez, intermediate	50.30	38.04
Mouth Red River	48.50	39.39

These differences of relative level have generally been attributed to abnormal local flood elevations, caused by increase of volume at the mouths of the tributaries. The reverse of this is the truth. The difference is in the extreme fall and not in the extreme rise at these points. The bed of the river has adjusted itself to the annually recurring demands of the discharge by increasing its depth where they are greatest and diminishing it where the discharge is dissipated by successive outlets.

It will be noted that, while by far the greater part of this difference of oscillation is in the depression of low water, yet there is some trace of abnormal flood-height. As the average considered includes three of the greatest floods on record, this would partially disappear were the term of years extended.

As the low-water surface closely conforms to the controlling bars, it seems obvious that any such general elevation or convexity of bed as is found between the tributaries must make these bars more prominent and obstructive to navigation. Between the Yazoo and the Red Rivers where levees have been comparatively well maintained, giving uniformity of bank-height and discharge, this irregularity of low-water slope does not recur, and the navigation is three or four feet better.

Since such levees as have been built have never restrained the higher floods in safety, it can not be expected that the "closing of existing gaps" will suffice to restrain volumes greater than those which have heretofore overwhelmed them; or to fairly test the principles upon which the recommendation of levees by the commission is based. They must be higher, stronger, and more continuous than they have heretofore been built.

The grade of levees for the improvement of navigation should be at least the normal height of the bank of the river or the height to which the bank would be built by such floods as recur with sufficient frequency to exert an appreciable influence in bank building or enlargement of water way. This grade is approximately indicated by points on or near the margin of the river, well above general overflow, where deposit has been carried to a natural limit, unchecked by swift currents, and undisturbed by caving. This grade should be supplemented by such additional height as will protect it against frequent injury and destruction.

Preparations must also be made in the grade for such increase of flood elevation as will at first and during the period of readjustment ensue from the introduction of greater volume between levees when made more continuous. It is not possible to predict at present to what this will amount, and it is probable that an exact conclusion will only be reached by experience.

There are variables entering into the problem so subtle as to require additional investigation and study. This is now being given. Numerous observed facts indicate that gauge heights for great discharge can not be predicted by extending the curves constructed at low and medium stages with these elements as co-ordinates.

Many of the discharge curves of the observations of 1881-'82 and other years show great irregularities in this respect.

The high-water curve plotted on Plate I is of remarkable symmetry, while the brakes in the low-water curve, to which the profile of the bed conforms, are greater and more abrupt. The imprint of the flood's power is on the bottom and not on the surface. The slope has proved more inflexible than the bed. The capacity of the river has increased as the discharge.

This indicates that increment of volume will not be piled on top of the present flood heights, and that flood slopes can not be changed over long distances from 25 to 75 per cent. The material of the bed does not possess stability under the fractional resistance such increased slopes would indicate. Indeed, which the impossibility of maintaining a slope greater than the average is indicated in the promptness with which slope is readjusted at every cut-off, where within a few hours the process of distribution is evident for very long distances, both above and below.

It is believed, to the contrary, that if an increase of .50 to .75 of the discharge can be arbitrarily and repeatedly withdrawn from and reinjected into the bed with very slight slope disturbance, it can be retained throughout the entire course of the river, and that even the maximum present discharge, by careful and judicious engineering, can be yet further safely increased, without ultimately raising the flood plane.

The following tabulated extract from Plate No. I compares high and low water slopes between the tributaries and a single intermediate station:

Location.	Slopes per mile.
	High water.	Low water.
Cairo to Fulton	.435	.360
Fulton to Helena	.426	.490
Helena to Malone's	.400	.302
Malone's to White River	.327	.490
White River to Lake Providence	.327	.278
Lake Providence to Vicksburg	.276	.398
Vicksburg to Natchez	.291	.277
Natchez to Red River	.194	.218

It is assumed that no argument is here needed to attest the practicability of a levee system. It is thoroughly established by a large experience that faithfully constructed levees, of sufficient proportions and age enough to have settled and become sod-covered, will resist any pressure. Of one hundred and forty-nine breaks in the Yazoo front in 1882, one hundred and forty-seven were caused by water running over the levees and eroding the rear slope. Caving of banks destroys far more than all other causes combined; but such loss will be reduced as caving is prevented, and permanence of bank will make the maintenance of levees of inconsiderable cost.

We therefore conclude that levees, such as have been herein described, are, in connection with an equalization of width and the prevention of caving, an important part of any general and systematic plan for the improvement of the navigation and the prevention of destructive floods; and we do recommend the construction of new and raising of existing levees along all parts of the river where the highlands are too remote to check the passage of large volumes of flood water outside the bed of the river; or, in other words, on the entire right and also on the left bank below Baton Rouge, and from the Yazoo River to Horn Lake, below Memphis.

As this recommendation extends to levees below Red River, where excellent facilities for navigation now exist, special reasons therefor seem necessary. It is not important here to repeat at length the principles on which are formed the regimen of a river so strictly alluvial as the Lower Mississippi. It has already been stated in the discussions of the commission that the dimensions of the river are of its own creation; that a larger volume collected in one bed is discharged with less friction, other things being equal, and therefore with less slope, and more beneficent results to navigation and riparian interests; while subdivision of volume, on the contrary, meets proportionately more resistance in each minor channel, and therefore requires more slope.

It follows from this law that every step in the improvement of the river, including its delta, which begins at the junction of the Mississippi and Atchafalaya, should be in the direction of the assembling of its many outlets into one channel, while subdivision in passes or dispersion through crevasses is a grave error.

Besides these general reasons, there are others, local in character but of great importance, which will appear on examination of the physical condition of this region why the work of improvement should include this part of the river.

As has just been said, the point where the Atchafalaya diverges from the Mississippi is the true head of the delta, of which the Mississippi, Atchafalaya, and La Fourche are the only remaining passes or natural outlets. The capacity of discharge of neither of these channels is normally equal to that of the river above, just as in the subdelta neither the South nor Southwest Passes or Pass à l'Outre has the capacity of the river above their joint head. But it is known that the Mississippi and Atchafalaya together can not now discharge the volume of a great flood without disastrous overflow in the region they traverse.

Thus, in 1882, the total flood discharge from the drainage basin above the head of the delta reached 2,200,000 cubic feet per second, divided approximately as follows: Down the Mississippi, 1,450,000; through the Tensas Basin as overflow, 500,000; and down the Red and Black Rivers, 250,000 cubic feet per second. Of this, 1,595,000 escaped down the Mississippi below Red River, and 281,000 down the Atchafalaya. The balance of 324,000 cubic feet per second entered neither stream, but escaped broadcast to the Gulf over the country.

The redistribution of a similar flood discharge, as effected by the completion of the levees above Red River, would be 1,950,000 from the Mississippi and 250,000 from the Red and Black.

Under the circumstances, one of two results is inevitable, and either would necessitate precautionary work.

In the first case the volume discharging down the Mississippi below Red River would be largely increased. This would require the temporary raising and strengthening of the levees on that part of the river. In the other case the water which now escapes in floods through crevasses in the Tensas front and returns in part to the Mississippi through Old River would reverse this movement if kept in the Mississippi, and would seek the lower levels of the Red and Atchafalaya through Old River with such force as not only to arrest the filling which now annually occurs in this channel, but also to deepen it and connect the deep water in the Mississippi with that in the Atchafalaya. This must be prevented at all hazards by work preceding the exclusion of flood water from the Tensas Basin.

These discharges of the Mississippi and Atchafalaya (respectively 1,595,000 and 281,000 cubic feet per second) are maintained for but a very short distance from the junction. Their capacity is rapidly reduced as they descend by repeated loss of volume over insufficient levees. Thus, while the Mississippi has a capacity at the gauge just below the mouth of Red River of about 1,500,000 cubic feet per second, at Carrollton, just above New Orleans, it does not exceed 1,000,000, as established by the following gaugings and computations:

	Cubic feet.
1851, Humphreys and Abbot	1,152,000
1858, Humphreys and Abbot	1,188,000
1880, Mississippi River Commission	987,000
1881, Mississippi River Commission	792,000
1882, Mississippi River Commission	921,000
1883, Mississippi River Commission	1,079,000

The surplus power of the flowing water is wasted over and through levees not sufficient in grade or strength to convert it into work. They offer less resistance than the bed of the stream. Thus, in 1884, the discharge at Red River gauge was upward of 1,400,000, and at Carrollton about 1,000,000 cubic feet per second, while between were the following crevasses:

	Cubic feet.
Morganza	211,000
Waterloo	46,000
Belair	14,000
Guidry's	3,000
Davis	140,000
Total	414,000

Similar breaks occur whenever the discharge past Red River gauge largely exceeds 1,000,000 cubic feet per second. It is literally true that these levees are awash in every flood of magnitude for hundreds of miles. For long distances the waves from storms and steamboats overrun them, and a continual outflow is only prevented in many places by boards set on edge and sand bags. It is, therefore, impossible safely to increase the slope even by a few inches in three hundred miles, and without this the velocity can not be increased nor the resistance diminished.

The mere introduction of additional volume into the upper end of a channel is not a practical compliance with the principles underlying the plan of the commission. The condition of affairs just described has been substantially unchanged for upward of fifty years—since the extension of levees up to Red River—and yet the volume discharged past that point, and recurring approximately with every flood, has not wrought out for itself below, in these many years, a sufficient water way. It has run vagrant over the fields, rather than work. The restraint and concentration of the present supply of energy logically precedes its increase. Without this, additional volume only means waste of power and disaster from overflow.

While the enlargement of any outlet, natural or artificial, should be promptly and finally arrested, the levees from Red River down should be sufficiently raised and strengthened to restrain and apply effectively such power as resides in the mass of water now necessarily discharging and to be discharged between them before greater servitude is imposed, otherwise the treatment of the river becomes merely local, of partial measures inconsistent with a general plan and general improvement. Such a plan must protect any and all parts of the river against the direct consequences of its application to other parts by providing for the safe conduct to the Gulf of a more rapid discharge of the volume flowing from above.

Therefore, it is the opinion of the commission that the building of levees for the improvement of navigation in the obstructed portion of the river can not proceed indefinitely without involving damages to the proprietary interests below; and if this portion of the improvement to navigation is to proceed, provision must be made for strengthening and raising the levees in the lower portion of the river where navigation is now good.

This recommendation is not based on conditions which will be continually increasing or even permanent. No reason is apparent why the law that a larger volume of water flows through a bed adjustable by its own forces to its own needs, with less resistance and slope, should not ultimately be fully operative here.

During the transition period unquestionably the increase of work will be indicated by increase of slope, which will disappear as the equilibrium is re-established.

The following general order is believed to be judicious in the completion of a levee system. As its object is generally to enlarge the water way, a common-sense analogy is found in the homely art of ditching. It should begin at the lower end. Each bottom, the Manchac, La Fourche, and Atchafalaya, constituting Lower Louisiana, the Tensas, Yazoo, White, and Saint Francis, should be inclosed in order from below upward.

In each bottom, as it is reached in the foregoing order, the most important levees, as restraining the greatest escape of water, should be first constructed.

Mr. Chairman, sooner or later the Government of the United States will be compelled, for the protection of its citizens and their property, to assume control of the Mississippi River with a view to securing the alluvial districts from inundations and the great loss of life and destruction of property which have been of such frequent occurrence in recent years.

The magnitude and importance of this subject have been so well and often stated, that it is useless to reiterate them at this time.

Nothing less than the adoption and inauguration of a national levee system under the direction of the Federal Government will satisfy the public demand. There will be ceaseless agitation on this subject until the Government does its duty by its citizens. It has been, and is now, and will continue to be for all time to come a national necessity. The farmers of the North and West and the manufacturers of the North and East find the most profitable markets for the products of their farms and factories in the lower valley of the Mississippi. One-half of the settled portion of the national domain and one-half of the population of the entire nation is embraced within what is termed the Mississippi Valley. Whatever benefits this half of our common country will inure to the welfare and prosperity of the other. All that vast area of territory lying between the Alleghenies on the east and the Rocky Mountains on the west is directly interested in this question. The States of Minnesota, Wisconsin, Iowa, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee are all as deeply interested in the inauguration of a national levee system as are Arkansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana.

The Senators and Representatives of these States can compel appropriations to build our levees, if properly united. There is no longer any question or doubt as to the constitutional power on the part of the Government to make the necessary appropriations. There may be a few hoary Bourbons of antediluvian times who look owlish and drawl about constitutional doubts, but no man abreast of the progress of the age any longer doubts the power of Congress on this subject. We all understand this to be "a Government of the people, by the people, for the people." Let it be in practice what it professes to be in theory. The Congress of the United States should give the people what they need, and if it does not do this then the people will be to blame if they do not elect Senators and Representatives who will. With the Representatives of the lower valley let this question be paramount to all other issues. This has become with us a life-and-death question. Local county or State aid will no longer suffice.

Both before and since the civil war very large sums of money have been expended by the local authorities. The State and county systems have been thoroughly and honestly tried by means of local taxation. Local taxation has had the test of a hundred years. It has always failed and must always fail to accomplish the object desired, in view of the vast destruction of property caused by the floods within the past few years, and it is within the vivid recollection of all that whole counties and districts of country have repeatedly been submerged, by which hundreds and thousands of lives have been lost and millions upon millions of property destroyed; and to-day a large majority of the people of seventeen States and three Territories demand that the National Government shall grant them relief against the angry floods of the Mississippi River. There should be no further temporizing with this question. The Federal Government alone can furnish adequate aid and afford permanent and certain relief.

This is not a political question, nor is it sectional in the least degree. I sincerely trust that neither politics nor sectionalism will carry any weight in this discussion. The riparian States—the States bordering on the Mississippi River—have neither the power nor the pecuniary ability to deal satisfactorily with this great question. This is not a State river; it is a United States river, and the United States Government alone possesses the means and the power to afford full relief and protection. No other nation in existence, or which has ever existed, has ever been so remiss in its duties toward its citizens where interests of such magnitude have been involved. No other great nation of either ancient or modern times has ever shown such apathy in relation to a subject of such paramount interest to so large a portion of its population.

Of the ancients the Egyptians were among the most advanced and enlightened. No higher evidence is afforded of the civilization and development of ancient Egypt than her improvement and control of the river Nile, in the interests of her people.

In Egypt proper we are told that it never rains. And yet Egypt is traversed by the Nile, and yet again the valley of the Lower Nile was subject to periodical floods and inundations until a general system of levees and reservoirs was established and maintained thousands of years ago. We are told constantly that the Mississippi, said to be very similar in many of its characteristics to the Nile, can not be controlled, and that all money spent in its improvement will be thrown away.

Shall it be said that what Egypt could do thousands of years ago, with its limited resources, we, with all our boasted intelligence, almost boundless resources, and more advanced civilization, can not accomplish? The floods of the Nile were circumscribed and held in check, and Egypt became in ancient times the granary of the Oriental world. The famine-stricken nations of the Orient were fed from the superabundant harvests gathered from the levee-protected valley of the Nile.

When we reflect what Holland, Germany, and Italy—mere garden patches in extent of territory to the vast area embraced within the Mississippi Valley—have done, a feeling of disgust tinctured with shame comes over us. The work will be a vast one. A large appropriation will be required to carry on and complete the undertaking, and doubtless some one will make money out of the work as it progresses. So mote it be. Those opposed will attempt to stigmatize it as a "job." Let them. The idle and surplus labor of the nation will be employed and the country itself developed; over 15,000,000 acres of the best corn, sugar, and cotton land on the globe will be reclaimed, and the wealth of the United States increased beyond the power of figures to compute, and the whole civilized world will be benefited. No Government engineer, nor the most distinguished engineer in civil life, has ever estimated the cost of a national levee system above $50,000,000. Suppose it should take $100,000,000? What of that to a country and a people as rich as ours? And what would even this sum be, large as it is, in comparison with the benefits to be derived? I have seen the statement that in 1861, after the breaking out of our civil war, a general railroad system was inaugurated in India which contemplated the construction of 5,000 miles of new railroads to stimulate the growth of cotton in that country, and the British Government agreed to pay the interest on the capital to be thus employed. The Mississippi River is the greatest inland highway on earth; teeming millions of inhabitants along its borders; great wealth is theirs; the soil is of unsurpassed fertility, and the climate genial and inviting, and nothing is needed to make it the most prosperous and flourishing portion of the habitable globe but a general levee system under the control of the National Government. If we do not get it, all this vast alluvial region will in the course of time, and that at no distant period, become an abandoned waste and howling wilderness.

The heart grows sick and the mind becomes morbid in contemplating the widespread ruin and desolation wrought by the floods of the Mississippi River in the recent past.

Let us then, ignoring all former differences, forgetting all feelings of sectionalism as a thing of the dead and buried past by laying aside all party distinction, unite with our brethren from every locality in favor of the most necessary improvement of any age or any country, which, when completed, so stupendous will be its proportions, will be justly classed as the eighth wonder of the world.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. HEPBURN. I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, as bearing upon this question I desire to call the attention of the committee to the report of the Mississippi River Commission in relation to the harbor of Vicksburg, which will be found on page 249 of the document. The commission there report that the balance available for the improvement of Vicksburg Harbor on November 1, 1883, was, in round numbers, $55,000; that there was allotted to that improvement the additional sum of $25,000; that there was expended of that sum, in round numbers, $27,000, and that of this fund available for the improvement of the harbor of Vicksburg the commission transferred to Lake Providence reach a portion amounting to $22,000, evidently concluding that no sum in excess of the amount expended was necessary for the Vicksburg improvement. They probably were moved to that action by the condition of things which is shown by their report. The engineer in charge, in discussing the Vicksburg Harbor, says:

The work here consists of improvement of the harbor proper and the maintenance of Delta Point, in Louisiana, opposite Vicksburg. The former [Vicksburg] is entirely local in character, and would add nothing to the general improvement of the work.

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The question was taken on the amendment offered by Mr. BARKSDALE, and it was rejected.

Mr. NICHOLLS. I offer an amendment, to come in after line 212, which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For building and keeping a dredge-boat and operating said boat for one year in the improvement of the harbors of Savannah, Charleston, and the Saint John's Bar, $100,000.

Mr. NICHOLLS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to have read, in connection with that improvement, a communication from the mayor of Savannah.

The Clerk was proceeding to read the communication.

Mr. NICHOLLS. Mr. Chairman, on the suggestion of a member of the committee I withdraw the amendment for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia withdraws his amendment. The Clerk will report the next paragraph of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Galveston, Tex.: The Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to construct such permanent and sufficient jetties and such auxiliary works as may be necessary to create and permanently maintain a channel between the thirty-foot contour-lines of said harbor and the Gulf of Mexico thirty feet deep at low water and not less than two hundred feet wide at the bottom; and all the works within the harbor that may be necessary as a means of procuring and maintaining said channel shall be constructed so as not to diminish the area of twenty-six feet of water in said harbor, and, so far as practicable by said works, said twenty-six feet area shall be increased. Said works shall be constructed according to the plans, specifications, and estimates to be submitted by James B. Eads, as hereinafter provided for, and shall be of a substantial and enduring character, not inferior to those at the mouth of the Mississippi River, and so made as to be protected against teredo and other marine insects.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, and Mr. SPRINGER both rose.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question or order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to strike out the paragraph just read, and upon that I desire to address the committee.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] is recognized and moves to strike out this paragraph.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Pending that motion, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] can not obtain the floor while the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has it, arguing in favor of his proposition.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his question of order.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I desire to ask the Chair if mine is not a privileged motion before the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] offers his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] did not make his motion before the gentleman from Illinois offered his amendment, and therefore the Chair need not answer the question.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has not yet offered his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois rose to address the Chair, and stated that his motion was to strike out the paragraph just read by the Clerk, and he now has the floor and is proceeding to debate that proposition. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER is recognized.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I had desired before the debate upon this bill concluded to submit some remarks upon the paragraph which has just been read. It is true that the committee has already devoted much time to the discussion of the question of the improvement of Galveston Harbor, but so far that discussion has been either under the rule for general debate or has been introduced out of order upon other sections of the bill. The committee having now reached that part of the bill making provision for the improvement of Galveston Harbor, I desire to submit some views in relation thereto. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in recommending the appropriation provided for in this paragraph has departed widely from the usual manner of making appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors. The employment of a particular person, or the requirement of the employment of a particular person, to carry on a particular work is such a departure from correct principles and well-established usage as I hope this committee and this House will not make without very serious consideration.

Having moved to strike out this paragraph, I will state that I am not actuated by any desire to defeat the appropriation for Galveston Harbor. On the contrary, I regard that as a very important harbor, and one deserving the attention of Congress and worthy of a liberal appropriation. But I am utterly opposed to farming out appropriations that are made for the improvement of rivers and harbors to be controlled by any particular individual or individuals, however eminent they may be as engineers. The particular engineer mentioned in this provision is to be paid $5,000 a year for his services and $3,000 a year for each additional foot of navigable water that is obtained there. I have seen it stated in the newspapers that the city of Galveston has proposed to pay him, in addition to this, the sum of $10,000 salary and $5,000 a foot for each additional foot of navigable water; making in all a salary of $15,000 a year cash and $8,000 for each additional foot of navigable water obtained below the present line. If he should be engaged ten years in making this improvement and it should cost the sum of money heretofore estimated by him, the Government and the city of Galveston will have paid this engineer at least $27,000 a year as salary and for the contingent amount to be allowed for increased depth of water.

How much additional might be made by the skillful manipulation of contracts it is, of course, impossible to estimate. I am utterly opposed to the employment of any individual in this way; I am utterly opposed to making an appropriation dependent on the employment of a particular individual. If this gentleman should die pending this work, your appropriation should lapse. If he should become non compos mentis, or, through sickness or disease, should become unable to carry on the work, everything would stop and this harbor improvement would be at an end.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER]. The gentleman proceeds upon the erroneous assumption that the provision which he opposes is to be permitted to remain in the bill. Now I desire to say to him and to the Committee of the Whole that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, at a meeting subsequent to the one at which they agreed to report this provision, determined, after consultation in regard to the Galveston improvement, to offer as a substitute for the provision now in the bill the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read as a part of my remarks.

The Clerk read as follows:

For Galveston Harbor, $500,000; and the harbor board herein provided for are directed to proceed at once to examine, survey, and report to the Secretary of War for his approval plans, specifications, and estimates for said improvement, and when said plans, specifications, and estimates shall have been approved, said work shall be carried forward with all possible expedition.

Mr. WILLIS. Now, Mr. Chairman, it will be seen that Mr. Eads is entirely eliminated from the provision in regard to Galveston Harbor. He is not given the control of the work; he is not to be paid an annual salary; nor is he to be paid a fee for securing additional depth of water. In other words, he has nothing to do with Galveston Harbor.

We believe that the Committee of the Whole will be ready to accept this proposition; and the Committee on Rivers and Harbors have instructed me by a unanimous vote to offer this as a substitute for all of these four or five provisions touching Galveston.

Mr. CUTCHEON. What is the part of the bill for which this is proposed as a substitute—from what line to what line?

Mr. WILLIS. It begins at line 213 and ends at line 305—embracing the whole three pages with reference to Galveston Harbor.

Now as to the appropriation which the committee recommend, we propose $500,000 instead of three-quarters of a million dollars. The Committee of the Whole will bear in mind that when the last river and harbor bill was presented it contained an appropriation of $250,000 for Galveston, but upon the motion of the gentleman representing the Galveston district [Mr. OCHILTREE] that provision was stricken out, so that in the last river and harbor bill the harbor of Galveston received nothing. Under the present estimates, according to the rule we have adopted, this harbor would have been entitled to another appropriation of $250,000; but in view of the fact that in the last bill this harbor received nothing, the committee have supplemented the ordinary appropriation of this year with that which they put in the last bill, but which was struck out on motion of the Representative from Galveston; so that, taking the two bills together, $500,000 for Galveston Harbor is no more in proportion to the estimates than any others of the great harbors of the country have received at the hands of the River and Harbor Committee.

I not only trust, Mr. Chairman, that this matter will be satisfactory, but I may say (going in advance a little) that in regard to the Mississippi River the committee have authorized me to offer an amendment which I believe will commend itself to all sound-thinking men on this floor—a proposition that hereafter the improvement of the Mississippi River shall be confined to the plans as detailed in the first and second reports of the Mississippi River Commission.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLIS. Just one word more. If this is done, this costly revetment system is done away with, and the objections urged on this point will be obviated. I ask for a vote.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the committee now rise.

Mr. WILLIS. I hope that will not be done.

Mr. MOULTON. Oh, yes; it ought to be done.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask the friends of this bill to vote down the motion.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 119, noes 85.

Mr. WILLIS and Mr. GIBSON called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered—more than one-fifth of a quorum voting therefor.

Mr. WILLIS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. RANDALL. If there is to be debate let us have it on both sides.

Mr. WILLIS. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. If the Committee of Whole should now rise——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that no debate is in order except by unanimous consent.

Mr. WILLIS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIS. If the Committee of the Whole should now rise and the House should adjourn would not the legislative day of Monday be gone?

The CHAIRMAN. That is a question to be determined in the House.

Mr. RANDALL. We want to go on with the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers have been ordered on the motion that the committee rise. The Chair appoints the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. WILLIS, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. TOWNSHEND. The tellers will take their places.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 129, noes 98.

So the motion that the committee rise was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BLACKBURN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HAMMOND reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8130) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HAMMOND. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next.

Mr. RANDALL. It may be in order, intervening business having——

Mr. HAMMOND. That is my purpose.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not in order pending the motion of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is it a question of personal privilege to which the gentleman rises?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I think so.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then state it.

Mr. HAMMOND. The gentleman from Georgia consents to nothing.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that, but wishes to hear the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. In the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That, in the judgment of the Chair, is not a question of privilege.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Will the Chair let me state——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can not let the gentleman have unlimited scope.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I desire to repeat the language of my colleague.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I make the point——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman refer to the language of his colleague [Mr. WILLIS]?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I will state if the Chair will allow me.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I make the point this is not in order pending the motion to adjourn over.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the Post-Office appropriation bill.

Mr. WILLIS. If that motion is voted down I hope I——

Mr. RANDALL. Debate is not in order unless allowed on both sides.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order except by unanimous consent.

Mr. POST, of Pennsylvania. I object.

Mr. WILLIS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIS. If that motion is voted down will it not be in order then to move to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of taking up the river and harbor bill? If so, I announce that is my object.

Mr. RANDALL. That same motion can be made after the other general appropriation bills are passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is the opinion of the Chair if this motion is rejected the gentleman can move to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and to state what his object in so doing is.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of personal privilege. I have the reporter's notes of what my colleague said this morning and I will read from them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman rise to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I do so far as the remarks of my colleague [Mr. WILLIS] are concerned in the speech which he made this morning, and so far as they apply to me I desire to make a denial. He used the following language. [Cries of "Regular order!"] This is what he said:

We have been delayed in the progress of the consideration of this bill because of the want of a quorum. As the Speaker is well aware, a good part of this House has been engaged in making up a Cabinet for the next President, and various members of the Committee on Appropriations, its chairman and several other members, have been included in that—and another portion of them have been engaged in festivities, and by their absence we have been frequently left without a quorum, and hence delay has occurred in the progress of this bill.

[During the reading of the above there were constant cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. SPRINGER. I object to this.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I deny that I have been engaged in any of these festivities. [Laughter and cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky is out of order and will resume his seat.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms will see that the order of the Chair is obeyed.

Mr. HILL, assistant sergeant-at-arms (without the mace), proceeded up the aisle and took hold of Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, Mr. WHITE resisting. The assistant sergeant-at-arms returned to his desk and came again, carrying the mace, toward Mr. WHITE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize no gentleman until all the members resume their seats and order is restored. [After a pause.] The question before the House is the motion the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriations bills.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask, Mr. Speaker, if there is——

Mr. RANDALL. If we are to have debate let us have it on both sides.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask the yeas and nays be taken at once in order to save time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Are the yeas and nays called.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of personal privilege. I desire to state, sir, that when I was occupying my place on this floor, the assistant sergeant-at-arms came to me, he a citizen, without any authority, without any semblance of authority—came to me for the purpose of arresting me on this floor. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BOUTELLE. This is the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. He went to discharge his duty under the direction of the Chair. The Chair ruled that the gentleman was not in order, and having requested him to take his seat he persistently refused to do so. [Applause on the Democratic side of the House.]

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I desire to debate the question I have raised.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Regular order.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I have the right to be heard.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks differently, and declines further to hear the gentleman on his question of privilege, holding it is not a question of personal privilege.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to ask in reference to that question of personal privilege whether a person without any insignia of office can place violent hands on a member and push him from his seat. I deny that such a thing can be done.

Mr. HAMMOND. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has heard no appeal from his decision.

Mr. CUTCHEON. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this is a question of the very highest personal privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And the Chair differs from the gentleman.

Mr. HAMMOND. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. CUTCHEON. And it seems to me that it is hardly competent——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia has risen to a question of order.

Mr. HAMMOND. I raise the question of order that, the Speaker having decided the question and no appeal being taken, all of these remarks are out of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is sustained.

The question is on ordering the yeas and nays on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 149, nays 117, not voting 57; as follows:

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. WILLIS. I object.

Mr. RANDALL. I only wanted to save time for the House.

The Clerk proceeded to read the names of those voting.

Mr. WILLIS. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Pending the announcement of the vote I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair). The gentleman can not, unless it pertains to the calling of the roll, until the announcement of the vote, which announcement can not be made until the roll-call is completed.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I thought it was completed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not completed.

[The Speaker pro tempore (Mr. BLACKBURN) here resumed the chair.]

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Pending the announcement of the vote I desire to rise to a question of the highest personal privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the vote having been ascertained by call of the yeas and nays, the first thing in order will be the announcement of that vote to the House, after which the gentleman will be recognized.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I desire to raise the question of order that then it will be too late.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman after the roll-call is completed.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. But if the vote shall have been announced will the Chair not then have announced the fact that the House has resolved to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and will it not then be too late to rise to a question of privilege?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks not. The Chair thinks the vote should first be announced, and that will be done unless the gentleman from Kentucky rises to correct or change his vote.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the House determined to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; and moved to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. And pending that motion I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania as pending, and recognizes the gentleman from Kentucky as rising to a question of personal privilege, which he will now state.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I have said, sir, that I rose to a question of the highest privilege.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of this House to what occurred on this floor a few moments ago relative to myself. I was addressing the House—the Speaker—in regard to a question of privilege. I ask that the Clerk now read Rule IX, to show that I was addressing the Chair under a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not understand the gentleman to have taken an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. But I now rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is aware of the rule to which the gentleman refers, and, as the Chair has suggested, no appeal was taken.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. But I am now seeking to present a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not understand that the gentleman presents a question of personal privilege by the statement of what took place a few moments ago, when the gentleman declined to take an appeal.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. But I am rising to a question of personal privilege as to what occurred with reference to myself at that time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can state it.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. If the Chair does not care to hear the rule read I will call the attention of the Chair to what occurred.

While I was stating, as I thought, a question of personal privilege, and before I had completed what I desired to say, the Chair ruled me out of order. Numbers of gentlemen were standing around me upon the floor and in front of the Speaker's desk. The Chair ordered the Sergeant-at-Arms to preserve order upon the floor, and now, in order that I may not be mistaken in stating what occurred, I shall ask the Clerk to read from the notes of the Official Reporter as to what transpired.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read what the extended notes show.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, having concluded reading an extract from the speech of Mr. WILLIS, made this morning. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. SPRINGER. I object.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, continued reading. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky is out of order and will resume his seat.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms will see that the order of the Chair is obeyed.

Mr. HILL, assistant sergeant-at-arms, without the mace, proceeded up the aisle and took hold of Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, Mr. WHITE resisting.

The assistant sergeant-at-arms returned to his desk and came again, carrying the mace, toward Mr. WHITE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize no gentleman until all resume their seats and order is restored.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. That is all that I wish to have read. I desire to call the attention of the House to this fact, that while I was addressing the Chair there were numbers of gentlemen on the floor, and when the Chair ordered the Sergeant-at-Arms to preserve order, a citizen, without any symbol of power, as is required by paragraph 2 of Rule IV—

The symbol of his office—

Referring to the Sergeant-at-Arms—

shall be the mace, which shall be borne by him while enforcing order on the floor.

I say, while I was addressing the Chair and while the Chair was attempting to preserve order, a citizen without any semblance of power came to me and demanded I should take my seat; and when I protested with the palm of my hand, without any violence, he laid violent hands on me and in an offensive manner demanded I should take my seat. He had passed numbers of gentlemen standing on this floor. Why should I be singled out?

If he was carrying out the order of the Speaker, if that was the intention of the Speaker, then like Cromwell this Speaker can put his foot down and say, "Go, begone." He can do as the speaker of the pseudo parliament at Constantinople did a few years ago when the Sultan was attempting to throw dust in the eyes of the civilized world to make them believe there was a parliament sitting for the Turkish people. If any member dared to do what the speaker did not wish, he had the sergeant-at-arms arrest that member and thrust him out of the house.

If a citizen without any symbol of power can come here and lay hands on me, then he can take hold of the venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY], who called attention to this matter in such eloquent language; he can take hold of any man on this floor. The country will take note of the fact.

I was reading what the chairman of a committee of this House had said of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations; that he had been away forming a cabinet; that members of that committee had been away forming a cabinet; that there was no quorum here because we were going out for festivities; and I desire to say for my part I had declined to go to that oyster or clam bake although the invitation was presented to me.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I call the gentleman to order. This has nothing to do with any question of privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not see that the gentleman from Kentucky is confining himself to the question of privilege.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. He evidently wishes to make a political speech. I object to his proceeding.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair asks the gentleman to confine himself to his question of privilege.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I am not making a political speech.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. That is what you are doing.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The gentleman should address his remarks to the Chair.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I address them to you. I address my remarks to the gentleman from Kentucky, and I call the gentleman to order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair asks the gentleman from Kentucky to confine his remarks within the proper limit of what is a question of privilege.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The question I raise is that if any person comes to a member on this floor, acting for the Sergeant-at-Arms, by the sanction of the Sergeant-at-Arms—comes to a member and attempts to arrest him without bearing the mace, and lays violent hands upon the member, he is unworthy to be an officer of this august body.

Mr. MILLS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I will yield for a question.

Mr. MILLS. Suppose the Sergeant-at-Arms sees a member involved in a difficulty with another member, and there is a likelihood that one or the other will receive great bodily harm, should he wait to go down and get his mace before taking measures to restore order?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. That has no relevancy to this case, where a citizen comes to a member on this floor without bearing any symbol of power and lays violent hands on him. I do not desire to discuss a hypothesis.

Mr. HAMMOND. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAMMOND. This identical matter was passed upon by the Chair and no appeal was taken from his decision. My point of order is that this argument is out of order without any regard at all to what may be its merits.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the facts are these—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would very gladly indulge the gentleman from Kentucky, but thinks the point of order taken by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] is well taken; and the regular order is demanded.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Some gentlemen would like to know what the point of order is which the Chair has sustained?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not the fault of the Chair if the gentleman from Maine did not hear what was the point of order sustained by the Chair.

Mr. BOUTELLE. But I submit it is the fault of the Chair if it does not give a respectful answer to a question which I have respectfully asked.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not think he is bound to answer the question, but out of politeness he will say the point of order was made by the gentleman from Georgia that the question that was being submitted by the gentleman from Kentucky had already been raised, and had already been decided by the Chair not to present a question of privilege, and no appeal was taken from that decision, although the Chair asked if the decision of the Chair was appealed from. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Will the Speaker indulge me? [Cries of "Regular order!" "Regular order!"] At the time to which the Chair has referred we were taking the yeas and nays, and I only postponed the appeal until the call had been completed. I now appeal from the decision of the Chair. [Cries of "Too late!" "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is too late to take an appeal. The regular order is the question on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House determined to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Pending that I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Upon what point does the gentleman appeal?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Upon the point raised by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND].

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, I think the appeal comes too late.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hardly thinks there can be any difference of opinion upon that subject. The effort of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] to appeal now from that decision of the Chair is clearly too late under the rule. The Chair therefore submits the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House determined to go into Committee of the Whole to consider appropriation bills.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills. The Clerk will report the first bill on the Calendar.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill (H. R. 8138) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is now before the committee for general debate, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] is recognized.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask a question of the gentleman in charge of this bill; I desire to know when he proposes that general debate upon it shall close.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, I am unable at present to say what will be the length of time desired for general debate. I can only say for myself that I am anxious to expedite the passage of this bill as much as is practicable. There are several new features in the bill. Some very important new legislation is proposed by the committee, and it will take some time to properly explain that new legislation so that the House shall vote upon it intelligently. I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] that in my judgment it would be best to allow the debate to run on for some time, because I think we shall then be able more easily to ascertain how much time may be needed. I say to the gentleman further that I will join with him in restricting debate within the closest limits that may be found to be compatible with the interests of the public and the proper explanation of this bill. This is a bill which appropriates over $52,000,000, and it certainly ought to have a reasonable time allowed for its explanation.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not yield the floor, Mr. Chairman, but I am willing that the gentleman shall ask me a question if he desires to.

Mr. WILLIS. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, after one test vote (to which they were entitled, as being in charge of the river and harbor bill), made no opposition to the will of the House to take up this appropriation bill; but it was announced then, and it is understood now, that the time for the consideration of all these important bills is quite limited, and therefore, in no captious spirit, but in the interest of the promotion of the public business, and with a view to the consideration of other important public measures after this one shall have been disposed of, I move that after this bill shall have been debated for an hour and a half the committee shall rise.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, I do not yield the floor for any motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] can not make any motion at this time. He can give notice of a motion.

Mr. WILLIS. Very well; then, Mr. Chairman, I give notice that at the expiration of that time I will make that motion.

Mr. RANDALL. I think it would be better to allow the bill to remain in charge of the gentleman from Illinois; and in that connection I want to say, for one, that in my judgment the general debate on this bill should not extend over to-day.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not think it will.

Mr. GIBSON (to Mr. RANDALL). I thought you said you wanted to pass the bill to-day.

Mr. HOLMAN. Two hours ought to be sufficient.

Mr. RANDALL. I thought that two hours would be sufficient, but the other side demand two hours.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, I now desire to resume the floor.

Mr. HORR. I think this side of the House will be satisfied with two hours and a half for the discussion of this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] is entitled to the floor and declines to yield, and he is entitled to one hour under the rule.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, I hope this discussion does not come out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. It must come out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] has time enough, at any rate. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] desires to make a statement, and I think that if the committee will listen to him the effect will probably be to shorten the debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The appeal must be made to the gentleman in charge of the bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If it will not come out of my time, I am willing to yield to the gentleman [Mr. HORR] for a statement.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] will be heard out of order.

Mr. HORR. Mr. Chairman, upon consultation I am satisfied that two hours and a half will meet the wishes of gentlemen upon our side of the House. That is the best I can do, and it is a very short time for the discussion of this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I think gentlemen had better consent to that proposition, rather than excite any factious opposition.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, what is the proposition that is made?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not entertain any proposition in regard to limiting the debate in committee. The Chair has been simply listening to suggestions made upon that subject by unanimous consent. All motions to limit debate must be made in the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, I desire to know if it is the wish of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] that two hours and a half shall be allowed to that side of the House for the discussion of this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] has so stated.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If that be allowed, proper courtesy, I suppose, would require that two hours and a half should be accorded to this side also.

Mr. HORR. Of course.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen will understand that although they make informal agreements upon this subject here in committee, when it comes to an actual motion to limit debate that must be made in the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, at the request of some gentlemen around me I would say I am willing to accept the proposition made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] and let general debate on this bill be limited to two hours and a half on each side. It is possible that the entire time awarded to this side of the House may not be consumed, but I would not like to bind myself by an agreement that gentlemen on this side will not wish the entire time. I will ask an understanding that the limit I have just named shall be the limit upon this debate.

Mr. ANDERSON. I shall object to that for the purpose of ascertaining whether there is no way by which debate can be closed at an earlier period. It seems to me that with all these appropriation bills hanging we had better vote than talk.

Mr. RANDALL. I have always found it better to accede to a reasonable request of either side as to general debate than refuse and then have more time taken by reason of the bad temper resulting.

Mr. ANDERSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is it in order to move to limit general debate on this bill to two hours, or I will say three hours?

The CHAIRMAN. The chairman of the Committee of the Whole can entertain no motion to limit debate. The Committee of the Whole can not regulate that matter except by unanimous consent, and objection having been made——

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] will not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] that all general debate on this bill be limited to five hours?

Mr. REAGAN. There is objection. In view of the condition of business I am surprised that gentlemen should desire to occupy so much time in general debate on this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] need not express any astonishment. We are compelled to meet the views of the House as a whole.

Mr. WILLIS. Why not submit the question to the House?

Mr. RANDALL. Because it is not in order to do so now.

Mr. REAGAN. It is not necessary to waste almost two days on general debate at this stage of the session.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, this Post-Office bill is an important measure.

Mr. REAGAN. All the new legislation in the bill will have to go out on points of order at any rate.

The CHAIRMAN. This debate is not in order. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, the bill now before this Committee of the Whole carries an appropriation of $52,253,200, a sum twice as large as that contained in any other appropriation bill except the one providing appropriations for the payment of pensions. It authorizes an aggregate expenditure exceeding all the appropriations for the support of this Government in 1854. It provides for the payment of salaries of more officers of this Government than any other of the great money bills. It is a bill which affects the entire business and industrial interest of the whole country. Its influence is felt in every village, yea in every neigborhood, of the land. All localities, all interests, all the people are directly interested in it, and it reaches into American interests in every civilized foreign country. It does seem to me, therefore, that a bill of such magnitude is entitled at least to five hours for explanation and general discussion, which is asked for.

The river and harbor bill, in which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] feels such an interest, occupied the attention of this House last week in general debate for several days; and that bill does not provide expenditures exceeding $12,400,000. I repeat, it does seem to me a reasonable request when gentlemen representing both sides of this House on the Appropriations Committee ask that debate on so important a measure as this shall not be restricted to less time than five hours for explanation and general debate. But, Mr. Chairman, in addition to the large appropriation this bill carries it contains some very important new legislation. Considering the amount appropriated and the character of this new legislation, it is in my judgment the most important postal appropriation bill that has ever been brought before this House. And I will say to the gentleman from Texas that when he makes examination he will discover that some at least of the important new legislation in this bill is not subject to a point of order; so that he and others will be called up to vote upon their responsibility as Representatives whether some of these provisions shall be retained in the bill or not.

I wish to say further that the Committee on Appropriations has had no desire to introduce this class of legislation upon this bill unless it believed that public interest demanded such action. We would have much preferred to confine the bill strictly to the appropriations for the postal service; but in view of the fact that the Calendar is crowded with business, and there is no possibility, perhaps, of any independent bill on those subjects securing final action during this session, the committee, looking to the general interest and necessities of the public and the economy in the use of public money, have thought it wise that we should meet some of the existing emergencies by introducing in this bill provisions which have been here inserted.

Much patient labor has been bestowed by the subcommittee in the preparation of the bill, and the general committee has given careful consideration to every item it contains, either of appropriation or new legislation. Our postal service is necessarily growing. It annually demands increased expenditures. In this more than any other Department of the Government there is a necessity for increased appropriations. The development of the country, its growth in population and commerce, require that we should recognize the necessity for increased postal facilities. Indeed if no increase of the postal service was required, such a condition of things would indicate national decay instead of progress. The Committee on Appropriations in a liberal spirit have responded to this necessity and recommended expenditures fully large enough to meet every want of this branch of the public service; but at the same time we have sought to avoid an extravagant expenditure of the people's money.

I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that this committee has been more liberal in its appropriations for the postal service on this bill, with few exceptions, than the Appropriations Committee of any Congress which has preceded it.

I have in my hands a table of the aggregate appropriations for the postal service since 1882, to which I wish to call attention:

Appropriations for the postal service for the fiscal years 1882, 1883, 1884, 1885, and amount recommended for 1886.

Appropriated 1882	$40,957,432
Appropriated 1883	44,643,900
Appropriated 1884	44,489,520
Appropriated 1885	49,040,400
Recommended 1886	52,253,200

Aggregate increase 1883 over 1882, $3,686,468; increase 1883 over 1882, 9 per cent.

Aggregate decrease 1884 under 1883, $154,380; decrease 1884 under 1883, ⅓ per cent.

Aggregate increase 1885 over 1884, $4,550,880; increase 1885 over 1884, 10¼ per cent.

Aggregate proposed increase 1886 over 1885, $3,212,800; proposed increase 1886 over 1885, 6½ per cent.

It will be seen from these figures that in 1884, the second session of the last Congress, instead of increasing the appropriation, as absolutely required by the increasing demands of the postal service, actually reduced the appropriations below those made for the year previous. I am merely mentioning this as a matter of fact, and not for the purpose of inspiring criticism on the action of the last Congress; but I do feel that I am warranted in urging this as evidence that this Congress has not dealt with the necessities of this service in an illiberal or niggardly spirit. It will be seen from this table that in 1883 the increase of appropriations was 9 per cent. In 1884 the appropriations were reduced one-third of 1 per cent. below the appropriations of the previous year. The appropriations at the last session of this Congress were increased 10¼ per cent. over the year before, and the appropriations of this year, as authorized by this bill, increase the appropriation 6½ per cent.

I will remark here, Mr. Chairman, before I go further, that the reduction of postage which occurred neary two years ago did not diminish the receipts of the Department. There was no loss of revenue by the act of Congress which reduced the postage to 2 cents per half ounce; there was actually an increase of revenue. The deficit which occurred the year following was due to the fact that the expenditures were greater, and I am willing to confess that large expenditures were necessary to meet the wants of the service.

The Department this year estimates that an aggregate appropriation of $56,099,169.50 should be made. The Committee on Appropriations have reduced the amount appropriated below the estimate, to $52,253,200, which is $3,845,969.50 less than the estimate, but which is $3,162,800 more than the amount appropriated for the current fiscal year.

This estimate of over $56,000,000 included an item of about $1,100,000 which would result from a change in the method of accounting between the Pacific railroads and the Government. Heretofore the Government has not made an appropriation to meet the charges by the Pacific railroads for carrying the mails, but has charged it up against the account the Government held against them for interest on bonded indebtedness due the Government by the bonded roads. This year the Postmaster-General recommended the appropriation of a sum directly from the Treasury to pay the accounts of the Pacific railroad companies, which would swell the appropriations to the extent of about $1,100,000. The committee deemed it to be the best policy to adhere to the plan heretofore followed, which necessarily reduces the estimates of the Department over $1,100,000. I ask attention to the report of the committee, which is as follows:

Mr. TOWNSHEND, from the Committee on Appropriations, submitted the following report, to accompany bill H. R. 8138:

In presenting the bill making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, the Committee on Appropriations submit the following in explanation thereof:

The estimates upon which the bill is based will be found on page 173 of the Book of Estimates, and amount to $56,099,169.50, of which sum the committee recommend $52,253,200, which is $3,845,969.50 less than the estimates and $3,162,800 more than the amount appropriated for the current fiscal year.

The estimated revenue for the fiscal year 1886 from the postal service is $51,272,820.24, or $980,379.76 less than the amount recommended to be appropriated. To meet this or such deficiency as may occur in the postal revenues a sum sufficient is appropriated from the Treasury.

The following table exhibits in detail opposite each title the estimates for 1886, amounts recommended for 1886, appropriations for 1885, and expenditures for 1884:

New legislation is contained in the bill as follows. On page 3, lines 43 to 53:

"That hereafter the Postmaster-General may lease premises for use for post-offices of the first and second classes at a reasonable annual rental, to be paid quarterly; but no lease shall be made for a term exceeding five years; and whenever any building or part of a building under lease becomes unfit for use as a post-office no rent shall be paid until the same shall be put in a satisfactory condition by the owner thereof for occupation as a post-office, or the lease may be canceled, at the option of the Postmaster-General; and a lease shall cease and terminate whenever a post-office can be moved into a Government building."

On pages 4 to 7, lines 67 to 153:

"That the Postmaster-General is authorized and directed to readjust the compensation to be paid for the transportation of the mails on railroad routes upon the condition and at the rates hereinafter mentioned, and which shall take effect July 1, 1885:

"'First. That the mails shall be carried upon any train at the request of the Postmaster-General; and railroad companies shall provide necessary depot-rooms, with heat and light for the same, shall receive the mails from and deliver the mails to the Post-Office Department at depots, shall put the mails into and out of the cars, shall transfer the mails between trains at depots, and shall transport the Superintendent and assistant superintendents of the railway mail service and post-office inspectors upon the exhibition of their credentials, and railway postal clerks over the lines upon which they may be assigned to duty.

"'Second. That the compensation for carrying closed mails in baggage cars and for railway post-office service, the minimum car width in every case being hereby fixed at eight feet and six inches (inside measurement), or its equivalent in floor-space, shall not exceed the following rates, namely: For closed mails, 5 mills per linear foot of space (inside measurement) per mile run; and for two hundred pounds of mail or less the equivalent of six linear inches shall be required, for five hundred pounds one foot, and for each additional five hundred pounds one foot. For railway post-office service, at a rate of speed of twenty or less miles per hour from terminus to terminus, five mills per linear foot of space (inside measurement) per mile run; and for each additional two miles per hour to and including thirty miles per hour one-tenth of a mill, and for each additional mile per hour one-tenth of a mill. And the adjustment of space by linear feet for railway post-office service shall be as follows: For a daily average of from twenty-five to five hundred pounds of mail, not to exceed thirteen feet; from five hundred to 1,000 pounds, not to exceed fifteen feet; from 1,000 to 2,000 pounds, not to exceed twenty-five feet; from 2,000 to 4,000 pounds, not to exceed forty feet; from 4,000 to 5,000 pounds, not to exceed forty-five feet; for 6,000 pounds, fifty feet; 8,000 pounds, sixty feet; the weight to be ascertained by a weighing of not less than twenty-eight consecutive days; and in all railway post-offices the load shall not exceed double the greatest weight for the respective lengths as herein provided; and for any gross weight, if carried on two or more trains daily, the space may be subdivided upon the basis of amounts of space for lower weights as the nature of the service may require; and no additional space shall be required or paid for unless found to be necessary: Provided, That the pay for the transportation of mails upon any railroad route for six round trips per week shall not be less than $35 per mile per annum; and at any post-office contiguous to a railroad route, and where trains do not make regular stops, the Postmaster-General may require that the mails shall be exchanged directly with the railway post-office at the nearest available point upon the track; and in the case of all special mail trains no more time shall be consumed at terminal points in transferring mails between different lines of railroads at such terminal points than is absolutely necessary for such purpose, and there shall be no delay in departure of any special mail train after receiving the mail from the connecting line than is absolutely necessary; and at post-offices located not more than one-fourth of a mile from railroad stations, railroad companies shall also provide for carrying the mails as often as may be necessary between such post-offices and railroad stations; but the Postmaster-General may provide mail-messenger or contract service at terminals: Provided further, That railroad companies whose railroads were constructed in whole or in part by land grants made by Congress, on the condition that the mails should be transported over their roads at such price as Congress should by law direct, and the railroad companies incorporated under the provisions of an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862, shall hereafter receive for the transportation of the mails over their respective railroads only 80 per cent. of the compensation authorized by this act; and the said act approved July 1, 1862, and all acts amendatory thereof, are hereby amended to conform to the foregoing provisions; but the right of the United States to further amend said act, or any act amendatory thereof, is expressly reserved. All acts and parts of acts inconsistent or in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.'"

On page 7, lines 156 to 162:

"The Postmaster-General is authorized to contract for inland and foreign steamboat mail service, when it can be combined in one route, where the foreign office or offices are not more than two hundred miles distant from the domestic office, on the same terms and conditions as inland steamboat service, and pay for the same out of the appropriation for inland steamboat service."

On page 8, lines 181 to 202:

"That upon all matter of the first class, as defined by chapter 180 of the laws of Congress, approved March 3, 1879, entitled 'An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes,' and by that act declared subject to postage at the rate of 3 cents for each half-ounce or fraction thereof, postage shall be charged, on and after the 1st day of July, 1885, at the rate of 2 cents for each ounce or fraction thereof; and upon all matter of the second class, as defined by said act and by that act declared subject to postage at the rate of 2 cents for each pound or fraction thereof, shall be charged, on and after the 1st day of July, 1885, except as provided in section 25 of said act, approved March 3, 1879, 1 cent for each pound or fraction thereof; and all acts, so far as they fix a different rate of postage than herein provided upon such first and second class matter, are to that extent hereby repealed on and after July 1, 1885."

"For transporting the mails of the United States in American steamships between any port of the United States and any foreign port, or between ports of the Atlantic and ports of the Pacific touching at any foreign port, an amount not exceeding $600,000 of the net revenues of the Post-Office Department of the United States on mail matter sent to foreign countries during the fiscal year next preceding the date of the contract for said service: Provided, That the contract for said service shall be entered into by the Postmaster-General, only after legal advertisement with the lowest responsible bidder, for a term not exceeding four years, and at a rate not to exceed 50 cents per mile on the trip each way of actual nautical miles traveled between terminal ports for each trip actually made, which shall not be increased on account of expedition or increased number of trips: Provided further, That the general laws regulating the transportation of inland mails shall be applicable to such contracts except as herein provided: And provided further, That vessels engaged in this service shall be of American registry, and shall in time of war be liable to charter or purchase by the United States at reasonable rates, and all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and this act shall take effect from and after July 1, 1885."

On pages 12 and 13, sections 3 to 6:

"SEC. 3. That a special stamp of the face valuation of 10 cents may be provided and issued, whenever deemed advisable or expedient, in such form and bearing such device as may meet the approval of the Postmaster-General, which, when attached to a letter, in addition to the lawful postage thereon, the delivery of which is to be at a free-delivery office, or at any city, town, or village containing a population of 4,000 or over, according to the last Federal census, shall be regarded as entitling such letter to immediate delivery within the carrier limit of any free-delivery office which may be designated by the Postmaster-General as a special-delivery office, or within one mile of the post-office at any other office coming within the provisions of this section which may in like manner be designated as a special-delivery office.

"SEC. 4. That such specially stamped letters shall be delivered from 7 o'clock ante meridian up to 12 o'clock midnight at offices designated by the Postmaster-General under section 3 of this act.

"SEC. 5. That to provide for the immediate delivery of letters bearing the special stamp, the postmaster at any office which may come within the provisions of this act may, with the approval of the Postmaster-General, employ such person or persons as may actually be required for such service, who, upon the delivery of such letter, will procure a receipt from the party addressed, or some one authorized to receive it, in a book to be furnished for the purpose, which shall, when not in use, be kept in the post-office, and at all times subject to examination by an inspector of the Department.

"SEC. 6. That to provide for the payment of such persons as may be employed for this service, the postmaster at any office designated by section 3 of this act shall keep a record of the number of letters received at such office bearing such special stamp, which number shall correspond with the number entered in the receipt-books heretofore specified; and at the end of each month he may pay to such person or persons employed a sum not exceeding 80 per cent. of the face value of all such stamps received and recorded during that month: Provided, That in no case shall the compensation so paid to any one person exceed $30 per month: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall in any way interfere with the prompt delivery of letters as now provided by law or regulation of the Post-Office Department."

Mr. Chairman, I am convinced if this bill be adopted in its present form it will carry every dollar that is needed for the public service—every dollar that will be required to conduct the postal service efficiently and up to the full requirement of wants of the people.

There may be a difference of opinion by gentlemen as to how much may be needed under specific items in this bill as to whether in some instances we have allowed enough or not, but my investigations have convinced me that every dollar properly needed for the postal service is provided in this bill. But aside, Mr. Chairman, from the fact that this bill carries the large amount I have indicated, much of the importance of this bill is due to the changes it provides in our postal laws.

The committee would have much preferred, as I have already stated, that such legislation should have been left to separate and independent measures, but the glut of important business before this House renders it necessary that these provisions should be placed in this bill, or they will undoubtedly fail of enactment during this Congress. The committee, regarding most of these provisions as being essential to an economical and proper administration of this service, have therefore authorized them to be incorporated into this bill.

The greatest change in the law which this bill seeks to accomplish is that of the method of compensation for the railway mail service. This is the most difficult problem which ever perplexed the officials in the Post-Office Department. It has puzzled the Department for over forty years. The present and former laws on this subject have been found crude, incongruous, and in many instances extravagant, glaringly unjust to the Government, while in some instances injustice has resulted to the railroad companies.

Congress for the first time recognized the railways as carriers of the mails in 1838, when it enacted a law authorizing the Postmaster-General to cause the mails to be transported by railroads, provided he should not be required to pay more than 25 per cent. over what was being paid to the stage coaches. This was the earliest recognition of the element of speed in fixing the compensation for carrying the mails, it being then determined that higher pay at the rate of 25 per cent. should be allowed for the more expeditious mode of transporting the mails than by the slow coach.

I shall not now detain the House with a discussion of former laws, as I shall present a document which will furnish a full and clear history of the nature and operations of the former as well as the present and proposed law. It is a report that was prepared by a commission appointed in pursuance of the act of March 3, 1883. This document deals with the whole subject ably and exhaustively. It furnishes evidence of patient, laborious, and thoughtful work, and should be read and studied by every member of Congress.

A study of the former and of the present law shows that the compensation for conveying the mails on the railways is dependent largely upon the discretion of the Postmaster-General. Under the exercise of that discretion gross injustice both to the Government and the roads has resulted. In some instances the compensation is much larger than it should have been, while in others it has been too low. No doubt much of this has been due to mistake, but often to pressure from individual railroad companies, and perhaps in some instances to favoritism. The act of March 3, 1873, now in force, brought about much improvement by prescribing even rates of pay for a like daily average weight of mail carried, but it is defective in essential particulars. It leaves unwise discretion to the Postmaster-General, which is subject to abuse and mistake, and is not thought to be much in advance of the previous law.

The law at present makes the following provision for compensation to railroads for carrying the mails:

Average weight of mail whole distance per day.	Pay per annum per mile of route's length.	Pay, less deduction of 14.50 per cent.
1 to 200 pounds daily	$50 00	$42 75
200 to 500 pounds daily	75 00	64 13
500 to 1,000 pounds daily	100 00	85 50
1,000 to 1,500 pounds daily	125 00	106 88
1,500 to 2,000 pounds daily	150 00	128 25
2,000 to 3,500 pounds daily	175 00	149 63
3,500 to 5,000 pounds daily	200 00	171 00

COMPENSATION FOR RAILWAY POSTAL CARS.

Railway post-office cars, 40 feet, per daily line	$25
Railway post-office cars, 45 feet, per daily line	30
Railway post-office cars, 50 feet, per daily line	40
Railway post-office cars, 55 to 60 feet, per daily line	50

From this it will be seen that under the present law the only element considered in fixing railway-mail pay is weight, with an additional allowance where a large daily average of mail requires it for rent of postal cars.

The commission to which I have referred in their report set forth the practical objections to the present law as follows:

First. The great volume of postal transportation is performed in cars or apartments and accompanied by clerks. Under the law there is no discrimination between service so rendered and closed mails carried in bulk in baggage cars. It is therefore to the interest of the railroad companies to provide the least possible space accommodation for the mails.

Second. The matter of frequency is covered by the indefinite expression "due frequency." Practically there is no discrimination, where the same weight of mail is carried, between cars or apartments, with clerks, run six, seven, twelve, or fourteen round trips per week, the less frequent securing the same rate as the most frequent.

Third. The matter of speed is disposed of in the expression "due frequency and speed." Under this law the speed with which the mails are carried, though a feature of great value to the public, has no effect on the rate of pay.

Fourth. The size of cars or apartments to be used is provided for by the following phrase:

"Sufficient and suitable room, fixtures, and furniture, in a car or apartment properly lighted and warmed, shall be provided for route-agents to accompany and distribute the mails."

All of this is insufficient and too indefinite to be continued as the expression of the requirements of the Post-Office Department with regard to the 115,000 miles of postal service.

Fifth. Specific allowance for railway post-offices is an entirely unreasonable method of compensating for the service required. There is no reason known why fifteen, twenty-five, or thirty feet of interior car space used for mails and clerks should not be made the occasion of specific allowance if forty, fifty, and sixty feet cars, used in precisely the same manner, are so treated.

* * * * * * *

Seventh. The present method is further defective because of the great inequality existing in many cases between the weights carried and the apartments provided.

An analysis of the tables accompanying the report of the Postmaster-General, showing the daily weights on all the roads in the United States, with the size of the apartment corresponding, will reveal such incongruities as the following:

On one road a daily weight of two hundred pounds of mail is carried in an apartment seven feet long; on another road the same weight is carried in an apartment thirteen feet long. On one road four hundred pounds of mail daily are carried in an apartment eight feet long, while another road carries the same weight of mail in an apartment sixteen feet long. On one road seven hundred pounds of mail are carried in an apartment nine feet long, while on another road the same daily average weight of mail is carried in an apartment forty-two feet long. Either in the one case the space provided is too small, or in the other case it is too large. In any case a system which would equalize the amount of space as related to weight would manifestly be an improvement upon the present methods.

These objectionable features the committee hope to avoid in the scheme proposed and herewith submitted.

The magnitude to which the vast appropriations for the railway mail service has grown and its rapid increase should arrest the attention of every Representative here, the largest single item of expenditure being for the transportation of the mails on railroads.

The report to which I have referred shows that—

In the year 1842 there were but 3,000 miles of railroad service, at an annual cost of about $400,000. In 1853 there were about 12,000 miles of railroad service, costing $1,600,000. The year 1883 shows a railway postal service 110,000 miles in length, at a cost of about $13,800,000, the increase in 1883 being equal to the entire postal service by railroad in 1853.

Each decade has doubled the railway service from its establishment, and if the present rate of increase should be maintained, and the present methods of pay continued, the year 1900 would show a service by rail of at least 200,000 miles, at an annual cost of not far from $25,000,000.

It exceeds the total annual revenues of the Federal Government under the administration of John Quincy Adams.

Now what is desired is to establish a basis of competition which will secure efficiency at such a rate of pay as will be just to the railroads and the Government.

The commission report that a rate of pay which will, in general, yield the railroad companies carrying the mail a return per car per mile run not differing materially in amount from the returns now received by these corporations for running their passenger trains can not be other than just and reasonable. I think such a rate too liberal, because the accommodations, expense, and liabilities of the mail cars are far less than the passenger, and approximate nearer that of express. The commission says a careful analysis of the returns of all the railroads in the United States shows that the average receipts from passenger trains running at the ordinary rate of twenty miles per hour between terminals is about 5 mills for each linear foot of car space per mile run, or 26 cents per mile of a car fifty feet in length. It also recommends that for railway post-office service only this rate be increased one-tenth of a mill for each two miles increase of speed per hour from twenty to thirty miles, and one-tenth of a mill more for each mile per hour in excess of thirty miles.

The only objections which have been found to exist in this scheme are that the rates agreed upon by the commission would result in giving too much to the largest roads and not enough to the smaller lines. To obviate this the committee has recommended that the rates be reduced to 4 mills per linear foot per mile, and that the rate for speed above thirty miles per hour be made uniform with that allowed for rates of speed between twenty and thirty miles per hour; or, in other words, one-tenth of 1 mill for each additional two miles of speed per hour above thirty as well as between twenty and thirty miles per hour, and in order to provide ample compensation to the smaller roads we have provided that the minimum compensation to any road shall not be less thon $40 per mile.

In looking over the table of rates of compensation per mile of railroads of the United States, I find that not more than some half dozen of them receive a compensation lower than $42.75 per mile per ton. We have made the minimum limit $40 per mile. We think that sum will sufficiently protect the smaller roads, and give them ample remuneration. The provision in this bill providing increased compensation for increased speed above twenty miles per hour supersedes the necessity for any specific allowance for special fast-mail facilities, as you will discover by examining the tables which the officials of the Post-Office Department have furnished to me, and which will be appended to my remarks, with directions for making proper computations under the terms of this bill.

This new scheme will secure efficiency in the service and present a uniform and systematic plan of compensation, which will be just and equitable to the railroads, and will at least result in an annual saving to the Government of over $1,500,000.

The late Second Assistant Postmaster-General Lyman, in a letter to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, said:

Having participated in the preparation of the scheme embodied in the recommendations of the committee, I can speak with some degree of positiveness concerning it, and have to say that the rate of pay adopted as the initial basis of compensation, i. e., 25 cents per mile run for cars fifty feet in length, is, in my opinion, not only a fair proposition, but is also the only just and practicable basis of payment for the peculiar service required by the Post-Office Department.

Under the plan proposed, compensation would be made according to the amount and character of the service rendered in each case; and the result would be to decrease the cost of transportation by railroad per annum $1,687,980.

The change which we make of rates recommended by the committee will result in a much larger saving. As I have said, the allowance for speed renders specific appropriations for special fast-mail facilities unnecessary, and therefore we have omitted such from this bill.

This undeniably presents a principle which will be just, uniform, efficient, and economical. The only question to be solved is to establish proper rates. The recommendations of the commission in its report are:

The committee would, in conclusion, respectfully recommend as follows:

(1.) That the compensation to the railroads for carrying the mails shall be determined upon the basis of the space used and the frequency and speed with which the mails are conveyed.

(2.) That the space factor shall be determined by the Postmaster-General, in view of the needs of the service, modified by the weight and frequency of the mails; that the speed factor shall be determined by the schedules of the various railroads, in connection with the official reports of the railway mail service.

(3.) That the pay for all mail transportation shall hereafter be at a fixed rate per linear foot of car per mile run. This rate to cover the entire cost of the service, furniture and fixtures in the car, transportation of postal clerks, &c.

(4.) That the Postmaster-General may at any time order an increase or a reduction in the amount of space to be paid for, if, after a weighing, it be found that there has been a sufficient increase or diminution in the amount of mails transported on any railroad to require the same.

(5.) The closed or pouch mails, now carried in express or baggage car, without postal clerks accompanying them, requiring no space for distribution en route, shall be paid for on the following basis, viz: the aggregate weight of the closed or pouch mails carried on any road on all trains for twenty-four hours shall be made the basis of pay, and this aggregate weight reduced to an equivalent in linear feet of car space in the following proportions:

Two hundred pounds of mail or less shall be rated as the equivalent of six linear inches to be paid for at the rate of 5 mills per linear foot per mile run.

Five hundred pounds of mail shall be rated as one linear foot, and for each additional five hundred pounds one linear foot of car space shall be allowed, with the proviso that the pay for transportation of mails upon any railroad route for six round trips per week shall not be less than $35 per mile per annum.

(7.) That the pay for railway post-offices, at a speed of twenty or less miles per hour between termini, be 5 mills per linear foot, inside measurement, of car space per mile run, and for each increase of speed amounting to two miles per hour up to and including thirty miles per hour one-tenth of a mill; i. e., twenty-two miles per hour, 5.1 mills; twenty-four miles per hour, 5.2 mills; twenty-six miles per hour, 5.3 mills; twenty-eight miles per hour, 5.4 mills; thirty miles per hour, 5.5; and for each additional mile per hour, one-tenth of a mill.

And it is further recommended that in the adjustment of space by linear feet for railway post-offices a daily average of 500 pounds of mail or less shall be entitled to pay for space not to exceed thirteen feet. From 500 to 1,000 pounds, space not to exceed fifteen feet. From 1,000 to 2,000 pounds, space not to exceed twenty-five feet. From 2,000 to 4,000 pounds, space not to exceed forty feet. And we recommend that no change in the allotment of space shall be made until the average weight reaches 6,000 pounds. For 6,000 pounds, fifty feet; for 8,000 pounds, sixty feet—the weight to be ascertained by a weighing of not less than thirty consecutive days; and no additional space shall be paid for unless it is found to be necessary.

In all railway post-offices the load should not exceed double the greatest weight specified for the respective lengths, and for any gross weight carried on two or more trains daily the space may be subdivided upon the gradients of space for lower weights, as the nature of the service may require; with the further provision that the Postmaster-General may increase the compensation upon any railroad route not to exceed 50 per cent. per annum for special mail trains performing service upon schedules fixed by him. In all these estimates the minimum car width should be fixed at eight feet six inches, inside measurement.

In order that gentlemen may make proper investigation of the cost of the service under the proposed law and be enabled to readily make computations with the data furnished in the reports accompanying that of the Postmaster-General, I will now call their attention to a rule for computation and tables of comparison of the cost of the service under the present and proposed law at the rates of 4 mills per mile run and 5 mills per mile run and rates of speed as therein specified:

Cost of carrying the mail on railroads on basis of 4 mills per mile run at twenty miles or less per hour, with an allowance of one-tenth of a mill for every two miles per hour additional speed, compared with cost under present law.

To ascertain the cost per linear foot per mile per annum, the rate per linear foot per mile run being given, multiply the rate per linear foot per mile run by 2 (which product is the rate for one mile and back), multiply that product by 313 (the number of round trips in a year), and the product will be the cost per linear foot per mile per annum for six times a week service at twenty miles per hour speed.

To ascertain the cost per mile per annum of any given road, multiply the cost per linear foot per mile per annum by the number of linear feet of space furnished.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I shall not occupy further time in describing the new plan that has been suggested. It is not a new thought. It is a subject that was introduced in the Forty-fourth Congress—a proposition somewhat like this, though materially different in important details. It, however, would have resulted in larger expenditure and lacked the degree of order and system of the proposed plan. It was then discussed, but was rejected.

The necessity for a change in the present law induced Congress to pass the act of March 3, 1883, appointing a commission of experts to devise a plan which would cure the defects of the present law.

That commission consisted of D. A. Elmer, the late Second Assistant Postmaster-General; W. B. Thompson, the late Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service, and now Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and Mr. Isaac C. Slater, all of them gentlemen of large experience and well qualified for this service. That committee had at their command a large force of very capable and experienced clerks. They entered into a correspondence with others who had experience and most knowledge on the subject. They sought and obtained a vast amount of statistics and information from railroad officials, and after they had gathered information and statistics from every quarter where it was obtainable they labored upon the problem for some eight months and formulated this proposition which we have incorporated in this bill. Those gentlemen then declared and still declare that if this scheme is adopted in the shape they recommend it will result in an annual saving to the Government of over a million and a half of dollars.

The proposition comes to us recommended by that commission of experts, and recommended by every officer of the Post-Office Department, from the Postmaster-General down to the lowest who has anything to do with this branch of the postal service. It has been studied and recommended by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads of the Senate and House. In the last session, when preparing the postal bill of that session, I was called on to investigate this scheme with a view to recommending it to the Committee on Appropriations. But I did not have time to ascertain what would be its effects; and fearing it might result in an increase rather than a diminution of the cost of the postal service I declined to recommend it. Since then I have had better opportunity to study it, and I feel now convinced it will be well for the Government and the facility of the service that it should be adopted. It is true that we can not fully determine what may be its exact results. It is probable that by experience we may discover defects in it. But we can never find out the defects or value of any scheme for this purpose until we test it by experience. Therefore I have concluded it is the best policy that it should during the next year be put in operation, and as we hereafter may discover defects they can be remedied.

How much further time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has occupied thirty minutes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish now to speak of some other features of the bill.

Another feature, Mr. Chairman, that we have introduced into this bill changing the present law is an increase in the period for which the Postmaster-General is permitted to lease buildings for the use of post-offices of the first and second classes. Under the present law he is limited to a term of one year. It is believed by all who have considered the question that it will be in the interest of economy and greatly to the interest of the Government to allow the Postmaster-General to extend the terms of the lease. And therefore we have authorized him under the provisions of this bill to make contracts for leases extending to five years, believing he can thereby obtain better terms for the Government.

Another feature of the bill to which I wish to call attention is in pursuance of a recommendation of the Postmaster-General, and that is to increase the weight of letter mail to one ounce for 2 cents postage. Under the present law, as is well understood, the weight of a letter carried by a stamp of 2 cents is limited to one half-ounce. It is believed by those connected with the Post-Office Department who have studied the question that this will probably not result in any material loss of revenue. On the contrary, they believe that circulars and other matter now carried open will be put under seal, thereby swelling our receipts. The change will undoubtedly result in great convenience to the people.

Another new feature in this bill is a provision which reduces the cost of carrying newspapers in the mail. Under the present law it is required that newspapers sent from the offices of publication shall pay 2 cents per pound. Several years ago I looked into this question, and came to the conclusion that as we had reduced the cost of letter and other postage, it would be just and right that we should make reduction of the postage on newspapers and periodicals sent from the offices of publication. In the last Congress I introduced a proposition which put them on the same basis with the newspapers circulated in the county where issued; in other words, it proposed to allow them to go free through the mails outside as well as inside the county where published. It struck me that if it was right under the law then in existence that a newspaper should circulate free in the county where published, it certainly would not be unjust to allow it to circulate beyond the boundary line of the county. I further believed it was in the interest of public education and the dissemination of knowledge, and I therefore introduced a bill for the purpose of amending the law which confined the free circulation of newspapers to the county of publication.

The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads have taken up the subject, and at the present session they reported a bill reducing the rate of postage on newspapers one-half the present rate, or to 1 cent a pound. The Committee on Appropriations have accepted their proposition and have ingrafted it upon this bill. This puts such newspapers upon the same basis with fourth-class matter or merchandise. It does seem to me that if playing-cards and dog-collars may be sent through the mails at that rate from New York to the mountaineers of Idaho, it is right to allow newspapers and periodicals to be transported at the same rate. I will say, before leaving that question, that I do not believe that any loss of revenue will result from the adoption of this provision, for the reason that now the great daily newspapers issued in the large cities are sent at short distances by express. If this provision shall become a law it will no doubt induce those establishments that send their papers by express to transmit them through the mails, so that the Government will gain largely by superseding the use of the express for the carriage of newspapers on short hauls.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is another important provision in this bill to which I invite attention, the provision in relation to compensation for the foreign mail service. During the last session of this Congress a bill was passed repealing the compulsory law which required American steamers before they were permitted to obtain clearance to carry the mails. The rate of compensation allowed for that purpose by the present law is the amount collected for what is known as the "sea-going postage," 2 cents on each letter, &c. The compulsory law, passed in 1873, made it incumbent upon every American steamer before obtaining clearance to carry the mails for the compensation mentioned. It is true that the Postmaster-General is permitted to exercise his discretion in allowing to American steamers the inland postage in addition to the sea-going postage, but in no instance, if I am correctly informed, has that ever been allowed; so that, as a matter of fact, the compensation has been confined to the sea-going postage.

Complaint has been made by the companies that that compensation is insufficient; and it is feared that those companies may after April next, when the compulsory law expires, refuse to take the mails for such compensation. They insist that when the compulsory law was enacted in 1873 the rates of postage to the countries visited by American lines of steamers were much higher than at present, ranging in some instances as high as 30 to 40 cents per letter. The companies say that they were satisfied at that time with the rates of compensation thus received, because the ocean postage was sufficient to pay them for the service; but they insist that when the international postal union in 1878 reduced the rate of postage at 5 cents throughout and between nearly all the countries of the civilized world their compensation was greatly reduced, in some instances so much so as to make it a burden and loss to them rather than a benefit to carry the mails. I have occupied so much of my time on other features of this bill that I will be unable to enter into a full discussion of this question, but I see before me gentlemen who have studied it, who served upon the committee which prepared the bill of which this provision is substantially a copy and who procured the passage of the compulsory law at the last session, and who doubtless desire to be heard upon this question. I will leave this discussion to those more familiar with the subject than myself. The subcommittee which prepared this appropriation bill did not recommend this provision when they prepared it for the general committee; they concluded to leave this question for the determination of the House on the bill now on the Speaker's table, and known as the Hunt bill, of which this is a substantial copy, except that this bill reduces the limit of rate of compensation one-half. For that reason the subcommittee did not change the estimate of the Department for that service; but the general committee by amendment inserted this provision in this bill and recommend its adoption.

I will only say further on this subject in passing—as I have no time for details—that it is absolutely necessary that something shall be done to insure the carriage of our mails to the Southern and Pacific countries. If nothing is done in this respect before the adjournment of the present session a serious interruption of our commerce and communications with those countries may follow. The compulsory law which forced American steamers to carry the mails having been repealed, they could now refuse to take them, and as they furnish about the only steamers making regular trips to the ports of Mexico, Central and South America, West Indies, and trans-Pacific and Australasian countries, it can be seen that the interruption of our mail communication with those countries would be very serious. I merely desire to call the attention of the committee to this feature of the bill, leaving the discussion of it for other gentlemen more familiar with the question than I am.

Now as to another matter. A bill was introduced some time ago by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SKINNER] for the purpose of providing an additional 10-cent postage-stamp to be known as the "special mail-facility stamp." The object was to provide a force of messengers who, immediately upon the arrival at the office of destination of letters bearing such stamps, would deliver them to the parties to whom they should be addressed. In other words, the idea is, that at any time from 6 o'clock in the morning until 12 o'clock at night (if I remember the hours correctly), as soon as a letter bearing a stamp of this kind is received at the office of destination a messenger shall be at once dispatched to deliver it at the residence of the party to whom it is addressed. The bill provides that the amount necessary to be paid for messenger service shall not exceed the amount collected by means of the 10-cent special-facility stamp—which is, of course, in addition to the ordinary postage-stamp, and that the pay of the messengers shall not exceed $30 per month. But as the gentleman [Mr. SKINNER] is here himself, and will doubtless be heard upon the proposition, I shall not discuss it at this time, except to say that, having given it some examination, I can see no objection to it. I believe it will afford great convenience to the public, and, as it will cost the Government nothing, I see no reason why it should not be enacted in this bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as regards the amounts appropriated, I have said that it will be found that we have appropriated in this bill for each item estimated by the Department a sum large enough to promote the public convenience and to properly conduct this branch of the Government service. Some of the estimates in the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General have been reduced. There is no reduction whatever made in the estimates of the office of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, and I desire to say that in reducing the estimates in the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General the committee intend no reflection on the officer who prepared those estimates, but there is simply a difference of opinion between that officer and the majority of the members of the Committee on Appropriations as to how much will be needed for that service. I believe the last retiring and the present Second Assistant Postmaster-General to be capable and upright officers, but I differ with them as to the amount required for portions of this service.

As I have said, in the office of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General we have made no reduction at all, but have accepted his estimates as to every item relating to that office. In the investigation I have made in regard to the estimates heretofore submitted by this officer I have found him exceedingly careful, very judicious, and economical in making his recommendations. Indeed, sir, since he has been in office the cost of the service under his charge has been greatly reduced; and as I wish to give credit where it is due, I will say I have no doubt this reduction has been largely due to the care and ability of this officer.

I find here a statement showing that the articles furnished to the Department in 1877 numbered 1,075,000,000 at a cost of $817,382; the articles furnished in 1884 were 2,205,000,000—more than double the number furnished in the former year; and the appropriation amounted to only $1,055,000. Thus it will be seen that the increase in the number of articles furnished was 1,130,000,000 and the increased cost $238,000, the increase in the number of articles furnished being more than 105 per cent. and the increase of cost only 29 per cent.

Mr. Chairman, I believe I am now through with the general discussion of the bill. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Fifteen minutes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish to reserve us much of that as possible.

Mr. ANDERSON. I could not hear what the gentleman said as to legislation in the bill respecting the Pacific railroads. Do I understand that the bill makes a direct appropriation to those companies for carrying the mails?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. On the contrary, we have refused to make a direct appropriation. I continue the present method of compensation.

Mr. OATES. Will the gentleman explain why the provision authorizing the Postmaster-General to pay rents of post-offices should not be applied to third-class offices as well as those of the first and second classes?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The committee did not consider that question. Any change in that respect would involve a change in the existing law, and a very large increase of expenditure. The subject was not brought before the committee, and therefore we did not take it into consideration, leaving the question to be considered by the House upon the bill reported by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. OATES. I understood the gentleman to state that the amount allowed by the committee to railroads for transportation of mails was $40 a mile. I see the figures in the bill are $35.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That has been changed by the committee since the bill was printed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, unless it is understood that the general debate shall be limited to five hours, I move that the committee rise for the purpose of limiting debate; but I hope the committee will agree to the limit which has been named.

Mr. WILLIS. I object to five hours' debate.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BLACKBURN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8138) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair asks unanimous consent to submit at this time several executive communications.

There was no objection.

DETECTION OF REVENUE FRAUDS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a list of special customs agents employed to detect frauds in the customs revenue, showing changes made and reasons therefor; also referring to the duties of such agents and the authority for their appointment; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

EXPENSES OF UNITED STATES COURTS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the Attorney-General, submitting a statement of amounts now available for expenses of the United States courts; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN KANSAS AND ILLINOIS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, inclosing a communication from the Supervising Architect, asking an extension of the limit of cost of public buildings at Leavenworth, Kans., Peoria, Ill., and Quincy, Ill.; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

STATEMENTS FROM BUREAU OF STATISTICS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, with an inclosure, a communication from the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics relative to printing certain statements discontinued under provision of act of July 7, 1884; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

BIDS FOR POSTAGE-STAMPS, ETC.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, transmitting a communication from the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, with inclosures, recommending a provision in the Post-Office appropriation bill relative to the submitting of bids for stamps, stamped envelopes, and postal cards; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

HUNTINGTON HARBOR, LONG ISLAND, NEW YORK.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report from the Chief of Engineers of a survey of Huntington Harbor, Long Island, New York; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

LOSSES OF PROPERTY BY ARMY OFFICERS, ETC.

On motion of Mr. ROSECRANS, by unanimous consent the bill (H. R. 5713) to provide for the settlement of claims of officers and enlisted men of the Army for loss of private property destroyed in the military service of the United States was taken from the Speaker's table, the amendment of the Senate non-concurred in, and a conference with the Senate requested.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced the appointment of Mr. ROSECRANS, Mr. MURRAY, and Mr. CUTCHEON as conferees on the part of the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOLLETT.]

APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FOLLETT. I rise, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of asking by unanimous consent the bill (H. R. 8039) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes, returned from the Senate with sundry amendments, be taken from the Speaker's table, and the bill and amendmenet ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

PENSION ATTORNEYS' FEES.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I move by unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the bill (S. 2511) relating to claim agents and attorneys in pension cases, returned from the Senate with amendments, be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest to the gentleman from Arkansas that he also include in his motion with leave to report it back at any time. It is a bill, I will say to the House, that cuts off the fee business.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the committee shall have leave to report at any time.

There was no objection, and the motion as modified was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WELLER, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence indefinitely, on account of the dangerous illness of his mother.

DRAWBACKS ON IMPORTED MATERIAL.

Mr. GEORGE, by unanimous consent, had leave to print remarks in the RECORD as part of the debates on the bill (H. R. 7651) to amend section 3019 of the Revised Statutes, relating to drawback on duties on imported material when manufactured and exported.

ADIX ISRAEL HEBREW CONGREGATION.

Mr. COX, of New York, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 8181) for the relief of the Adix Israel Hebrew congregation; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move, Mr. Speaker, when the House resumes consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill general debate thereupon shall be limited to five hours, including the time already consumed in discussion; and on that motion I demand the previous question.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to let this House express its will on the amendment to limit the debate to one hour and a half additional to what has already been given.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman occupied a solid week on the river and harbor appropriation bill, and here is a bill involving $52,000,000.

Mr. WILLIS. It was not the will of our committee the House occupied the time, as we asked to reduce the time for general discussion. This committee asks to increase the time. We want to pass the river and harbor appropriation bill, and they seem to want to delay their bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I object to this discussion, as I have demanded the previous question on the motion to close debate.

Mr. WILLIS. Then I give notice if the demand for the previous question is voted down I will submit the amendment which I have indicated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can only state the motions before the House.

The question recurred on the demand for the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 124, noes 41.

Mr. BLANCHARD demanded tellers.

Mr. WILLIS. The demand for tellers is withdrawn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the previous question is ordered.

Mr. TOWNSHEND moved to reconsider the vote by which the demand for the previous question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSHEND'S motion was then agreed to for the limitation of the debate on the Post-Office appropriation bill in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to five hours, including the time already expended.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Have I not twelve minutes of my time remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has still twelve minutes of his time left.

Mr. HORR. Mr. Chairman, this bill appropriates about fifty-two and a quarter million dollars on estimates made by the Department of $56,000,000 in round numbers. But in the $56,000,000 is included $1,100,000 of the Union Pacific and its branches, an item which is put in the estimates simply as a matter of book-keeping. So really the estimates of the Department are $55,000,000, and the bill attempts to meet the needs of that service with $52,250,000.

As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] has stated, this bill has incorporated into it a large amount of new legislation, some of it very important and very wise and some of it important and I think very unwise.

It attempts to change the present method of payment of the railroads of the United States for carrying the mails, and proposes to base their compensation upon a new and untried plan, and in doing it the gentleman from Illinois states to the House that in his opinion it will save at 5 mills per linear foot about $600,000, and at the proposed rate, for he intends to amend the bill by fixing it at 4 mills a linear foot instead of 5, it must save $1,500,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. HORR. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to know if the effect of this plan, if there is any saving, will not be by decreasing the compensation of the small roads of the country.

Mr. HORR. I will come to that.

Mr. BLOUNT. And if it is not admitted that in the operations of the bill the great trunk lines will get increase of pay.

Mr. HORR. I will come to that if the gentleman from Georgia will wait a moment. Let me say, however, that I desire to have any one ask me any question as I proceed that may occur to him, because it is a mathematical problem that I am working at, and I hope to make it plain to this House, first, that this new plan instead of decreasing the compensation of the railroads will increase them on the 5-mills basis, and secondly that it is unjust in its distribution and in its application, and as the gentleman from Georgia just intimated by his question, it decreases the pay of the long poor roads and short poor roads that run only six trips per week and puts an excess of pay into the pockets of railroad companies which now get large amounts. I think I can prove this to the satisfaction of every member of this House. If it does that, no one will claim that we should change the plan. I wish to say frankly, however, that this bill came to the Committee on Appropriations with the unanimous indorsement and recommendation of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of this House.

We ingrafted this provision into the bill with my assent also, because at that time I thought that it was going to be a great saving, taking as I did the estimates of men who had examined and prepared the bill. But, fearing that there might be some mistake about it, I tackled the plan as best I could, and now, after a large amount of careful study, I think I have been enabled to get at the bottom of this proposed change, and believe I am able to show to the House that this is the last thing in the world that should be incorporated into the bill providing for this service.

The first question arose as to how we can get at the fact whether this bill is a saving or not. If you will take the tables which the gentleman from Illinois has, and I do not know whether he intends to publish them or not——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do.

Mr. HORR. If you take those tables prepared by the parties who are in favor of this measure you will find that upon the face of those figures it looks as if there will be a big saving in the future. You will find mathematically it looks very much like a saving of money and a great improvement upon the present plan. But there are men here who remember—the gentleman from New York, Mr. COX, will recollect—that they brought in here a new system from the Census Bureau for figuring out the apportionment in the last Congress which was perfect in its mathematical bearings, but when we came to examine it we found that the result was that it gave more members to States that ought not to have had them and took them away from States that ought to have had them. So the result is what we want to get at in this matter before we change the law affecting an appropriation of about $15,000,000. The real question is, what will be the outcome of this change? How much do the roads get now and how much will they get then?

So I directed my attention to this proposition: What effect will this bill have upon the different railroads of the country if adopted? And to do this I selected at random, I think, perhaps two hundred roads, and with the aid of my friend from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] we worked out their present compensation and their compensation under this new plan. The result which we arrived at I desire now to give to the House to show what in our judgment will be the effect of this change. I do not propose to show the result in all the two hundred different cases, but in a few cases, selected I trust, so as to fairly illustrate the question here involved, and I hope to be able to show to the House where the difficulty in this bill lies, for it is a mathematical question, and is capable of a mathematical solution.

Take the Lake Shore road from Buffalo to Elyria, through Cleveland. That route runs from Buffalo to a town twenty-five miles west of Cleveland, called Elyria.

It is two hundred and eight miles long. It carries a large mail—89,031 pounds each day. Under the present rate the road from Buffalo to Cleveland gets $1,398.75 per mile. That is the amount it receives per year for each mile of its road measured between the terminal points, Cleveland and Buffalo.

Let me state right here—for some members of the House may not have given it any attention—we pay the roads now by weight per mile of track $200 for the first 5,000 pounds, and then $1 more per mile for every eighty pounds over the 5,000 pounds. Then, in addition to that, roads that furnish post-office cars get for a car forty feet long $25; for a car forty-five feet long, $30; for a car fifty feet long, $40; and for a car fifty-five long, $50; and for a car sixty feet long they get $55, if my memory serves me aright. Understand me; they get those sums for these post-office cars in addition to the amounts paid for weight just named.

Now, as I said, from Cleveland to Buffalo, one hundred and eighty-three miles, they get $1,398.75 a mile; from Cleveland to Elyria, twenty-five miles, they get $1,434.37 a mile. That is, that route now pays that railroad company $279,063.65 for the whole year. Now let us see how much they will receive under the new plan, allowing them 5 mills per linear foot for the car space now used. This bill, you will see, allows 5 mills per linear foot for each mile run, and all roads carrying less than 500 pounds of mail can not use more than thirteen linear feet in a car. It may carry that amount in a less space, in which case they would get less pay. But they can not go above it. For a daily average of 500 pounds to 1,000 pounds they get not to exceed fifteen feet; from 1,000 pounds to 2,000 pounds, not to exceed twenty-five feet; from 2,000 pounds to 4,000 pounds, not to exceed forty feet; from 4,000 pounds to 5,000, not to exceed forty-five feet; for 6,000 pounds, fifty feet; for 8,000 pounds, sixty feet.

Right here let me make this statement in addition. The above rates are for a speed of twenty miles an hour. For every two miles of speed per hour in addition this bill gives them an increase of one-tenth of a mill per linear foot. For twenty-eight miles per hour five mills and four-tenths of a mill would be the rate per linear foot. After it gets above thirty miles then one-tenth of a mill for every single mile is added. But the subcommittee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], propose to cut out the last increase, so that as they propose now to amend the bill it will only give one-tenth of a mill for every two miles from twenty up to forty miles an hour.

Now, then, let us get back to our illustration. Under this new plan, as the bill was reported by the committee and as it now stands, this Buffalo and Elyria route would get $301,529.35 for the entire year. That is a gain of $22,465.75 over the present pay. Under the new plan they will get $1,487.05 a mile from Buffalo to Cleveland and $1,683.11 per mile from Cleveland to Elyria. At 4 mills per linear foot, which is according to the proposed amendment, there will be a loss to this road of about $21,000 a year.

Take the road from Charleston to Savannah. This road is one hundred and fifteen miles long. It carries 7,194 pounds of mail per day. At present it gets $259.09 per mile. It gets a total during the year of $29,795.35. Under the new plan, at 5 mills, it would get a gain of $6,001.85. Under the rate of 4 mills instead of 5 per linear foot it would gain only $426; so that the 4-mill rate brings that road down to about the same that it is getting now.

Take the road from Atlanta to Chattanooga, a distance of one hundred and thirty-eight miles. That road carries a daily average of mail of 8,067 pounds. It has a speed of twenty-four miles per hour. Their present pay is $293.49 per mile. They get now a total of $30,549.56 per year. Under the new plan, at five mills and two-tenths of a mill for twenty-four miles speed, they would get $37,194.26; a gain of $6,644.70.

Mr. BLOUNT. I presume in that comparison the amount under the present law is not only for the weight but for postal-car service too?

Mr. HORR. It is the amount all together.

Mr. BLOUNT. All included.

Mr. HORR. It is the amount all together. In all these cases I give the total amount each road gets for weight and postal cars.

Mr. BLOUNT. I supposed you did.

Mr. HORR. If you should reduce it to four mills and two-tenths, that road would get $2,430 less than it gets now.

Again, take the road from Milwaukee to La Crosse. They have a daily average of 35,167 pounds of mail, and run a distance of one hundred and ninety-eight miles, at a speed of thirty-four miles per hour. Their present pay is $668.34 per mile. They get in a year $132,296.30. Under the new plan they would get $170,480.70, or a gain of $38,184.40. At the 4-mill rate they would still make a gain of $4,505.86.

Take the Michigan Central road from Detroit to Chicago. I give this large number of instances in order that you may see that the outcome is the same in substance, and so as to have cases enough to get at the principle. That road gets now $360.83 per mile for a distance of two hundred and eighty-five miles and runs thirty miles per hour. They get $102,836.55 a year. At 5.5 mills a linear foot they would get $120,013.50—a gain of $17,176.95 to that road. It would be a loss, if you reduce it to 4.5 mills, of $4,643.16. Understand me, this bill as now proposed by the committee would give this road that amount less than it receives under the present law.

Take the route from Elkhart to Chicago. That road carries on an average 63,780 pounds daily. The distance is one hundred and one miles; speed twenty-eight miles per hour. The pay now is $912.83 a mile. Under the new plan, at 5.4 mills, they would get $1,143.85 a mile, and the total would be $115,518.85 as against the present total of $92,185.83; a gain of $23,333.02 over the present plan. At 4.4 mills per foot this road would still gain $11,790.64.

The route from Columbus to Cincinnati would gain by the new plan $9,986.40 at the 5-mill rate, and at the 4-mill rate would lose $530.40.

Now take the road from New Orleans to Cairo; that is a long route—five hundred and fifty miles. It carries a daily average of 4,317 pounds and runs twenty-four miles per hour. At present that road gets a low rate, only $185.74 per mile. At the new rate, 5.2 mills, they will get just about what they get now; but if you reduce the rate to 4 mills instead of 5, then there will be a loss to that road of nearly $27,000 a year.

Mr. BLOUNT. Have you the figures for the Pennsylvania Central?

Mr. HORR. Yes, sir. I have just received them; but I have not had time to look them over.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman [Mr. HORR] state whether he has got the figures for the Pacific railroads?

Mr. HORR. I am now coming to them. Take the road from San Francisco to Ogden, which is one of the Union Pacific system. The length of line is 834 miles; speed, 20 miles per hour; average weight of mail per day, 20,046 pounds. It now gets on 784 miles $381.74 a mile, and on 50 miles, a short route from San Francisco to some other city, it receives $406.74 a mile. The total amount is $319,621.16 per year. Now, mark; on this plan, at 5 mills, this road would get only $219 a mile on the 784 miles distance, and $438 per mile on the 50 miles. It would get only a total of $193.596 for the year as against $319,621.16 under the present law.

That is a total loss of $135,762.16. Then the bill comes in and undertakes, in spite of the charter of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, to cut that amount down, and say that it shall have only 80 per cent. of that sum, which will reduce the amount $38,719 more, making a total loss of $174,481.36, and if you should make the reduction to 4 mills, as is now proposed, then they would get only $123,901.44 where they now get $319,621.16, so that they would then get a large sum less than half the amount they get now. The route from Omaha to Ogden, a distance of 1,034 miles, carrying 29,665 pounds of mail daily, is in almost the same position. They get now for 374 miles $509.34 per mile, and for 660 miles $484.34 per mile; making, for the entire 1,034 miles, $477,091.56 per year. Under the new plan at 5 mills there would be a loss there of $53,638.54, and 20 per cent. more off would make the loss $138,329. At 4 mills they would get only $340,423.82 as against $477,091.56, a loss of $136,667.74, to which add the 20 per cent. reduction made by this bill on account of its being a land-grant road, and the loss would be $204,751.90 a year.

Mr. MONEY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HORR. Certainly.

Mr. MONEY. I have heard frequent mention in the gentleman's remarks of a reduction to 4 mills; is there any proposition of that sort here?

Mr. HORR. Mr. TOWNSHEND gave notice that the committee had agreed to recommend a reduction from 5 to 4 mills.

Mr. MONEY. It is not in the bill.

Mr. HORR. It is not in the bill yet; but it will be when the committee comes to amend it; that he will offer as an amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. RYAN. What committee proposed that?

Mr. HORR. It was done by the subcommittee, but with the authority of the full committee. The full committee authorized the subcommittee to amend the bill as to this new plan as we might consider best.

Mr. RYAN. But there has been no ratification of that action?

Mr. HORR. No; there has been no ratification of it. My plan—there is no secret about it—was to strike this new plan all out. The other members of the subcommittee undertook to evade the increase of pay, the irregularities and discrepancies of the bill, by putting in "4" mills instead of "5," I suppose because they became convinced that the very roads which under the present plan get a good deal would get very much more under the new plan if the rate should remain at 5 mills.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to state this proposition, and I am sorry that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] is not now in his seat, but I observe that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is. I affirm that under this new plan every road that runs only one trip a day, six or seven trips a week, no matter whether a long or a short route, I do not care where you find the road, nor what may be the amount of mail that it carries, it will be cut down by this bill. Most of the roads which run only one trip a day carry but a few pounds of mail. On the other hand, wherever you find a road that makes a large number of trips per week this bill increases its compensation, and gives every such road a good deal more than it gets now. If you will figure it out you will find that the result is invariably the same. The lowest that any of the roads (with the exception, perhaps, of half a dozen one-horse roads) get now is $42.75 per mile. The law gave at first $50 per mile to roads carrying from twenty-five to two hundred pounds per day. Afterward that was reduced 10 per cent. And then still later another reduction was made of 5 per cent. on what the railroads then received, which leaves a large number of routes paying only $42.75 per mile per year.

Some gentlemen are asking me for the New York Central and Pennsylvania Railroads. I am sorry I did not get these reports earlier, because I do not know that I can master them here in the limited time I have at command, but I see at a glance enough to justify me in making this statement—the roads running from New York city to Philadelphia, and the road from New York city to Buffalo, the New York Central.

I find that the new plan largely increases the compensation that those roads now get; but I can not give exact figures without more time to examine them; but you will find they are no exception to the rule laid down, and I will show you why in a moment—I will demonstrate that this plan increases the pay on account of the increased number of trips, while every railroad that only makes six or seven trips a week is slaughtered. Thus the bill strikes a blow at the Southern and Western roads, while it is a regular "bonanza" for the great Eastern lines. It is scriptural in the extreme, as it verifies the statement that "to him that hath shall be given and from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath."

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the gentleman be kind enough to state whether the Treasury of the United States, as well as the weak roads, will have to respond to make up the "bonanza" for these larger roads?

Mr. HORR. In my judgment—I have to run counter to the experts who have figured on this matter, but I have made the best estimate I can—I think that this rate of 5 mills, instead of saving a million of dollars to the United States Treasury, will make the cost of railroad mail transportation a million and a half dollars greater than it now is; and every dollar which the Government thus loses will go into the treasury of the roads, which now receive large sums for carrying the mails.

Mr. TILLMAN. Besides robbing the poor roads.

Mr. HORR. Under this bill all the roads that now receive $60 per mile or less will be cut down to $35 per mile, or rather $40, as the other members of the subcommittee now propose to make it. It looked so terrible, when they came to think it over, that they have decided to change their figures in the bill; instead of striking out the plan altogether they propose to strike out $35 and insert $40. But the result will be that every road in the United States now getting not more than $60 a mile will be cut down to $40, except the roads running two trips a day, making twelve to fourteen trips a week; and these will be held up just about where they are now.

Now, what is the trouble with this new plan mathematically, practically? It is not a very abstruse proposition. If I had a blackboard I could make the matter plain in a few moments, but perhaps I can get along without that. This bill proposes to pay 5 mills, and when amended will pay 4 mills for every linear foot occupied in the car until you get up to the full car, and then the price is still the same, so much a linear foot for car run. This is the wording of the bill; it was intended to be the wording of the bill. Consequently the road gets this pay for every single mile run, and if it makes fourteen trips a week it gets twice as much pay as when it runs one trip a day, whereas under the present law the mail may go over the road twenty times in one day, and the company will not get anything extra, unless it carries more pounds of mail or takes more post-office cars, which are paid for at so much per year per mile of track.

Consequently, under this new plan all roads making a few trips will get small results, and a large number of trips give large results; and, therefore, roads that carry but little mail and go through sparsely populated portions of the country, where the passenger business does not warrant running more than a train a day or six trips a week, will be compelled to do the work for less than they do it now; and these very roads do it now, as I shall presently show, for a great deal less than it is worth.

At the same time this plan gives increased compensation to the rich roads, whose treasuries are already filled by their large outside work and this Government pay besides. These roads which use from one hundred and fifty to three hundred linear feet of space get the same price per foot as those using only twenty to thirty linear feet; in other words, it pays retail prices for wholesale work.

I do not claim that these roads get any more than they earn. This bill seems to be in the right direction. It takes into account space, weight, speed, and frequency, and these elements one would think ought to be taken into account; but the difficulty is that it overlooks this great fact—that where roads carry enormous quantities of mail and make an enormous number of trips, they can afford to receive less per linear foot per mile than roads that make but one trip each day and use but small space. Consequently this bill is in the interest of corporations that do not need help, while it sacrifices the poorer roads that can not afford to be cut down.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I suppose when the gentleman speaks of "roads that do not need it," he means roads that can not afford to carry the mails at the compensation proposed.

Mr. HORR. Yes; roads which are now carrying the mails for less than the service is worth, but which are compelled to do the work because it accommodates their customers all along the line.

Mr. ANDERSON. I would like the gentleman to give his opinion about the aggregate under the 4-mill plan. He has said that the 5-mill plan would cost a million and a half dollars more than the present cost. What would be the aggregate under the 4-mill plan?

Mr. HORR. My impression is that the 4-mill plan would save the Government considerable money.

Mr. ANDERSON. A million or two?

Mr. HORR. Perhaps a million or one and a half millions. It would leave the roads which get large pay now with little change; but it would take all this saving out of the roads that the 5-mill plan reduces; in short, it will compel the roads that get small pay now to take still less, and will leave the great New York, Pennsylvania, and Eastern roads generally about where they now are. To be local in the statement, it will reduce the pay of the roads long and short in the sparsely populated West and South, and will increase or not affect the pay of the thickly settled Eastern and Middle States.

The question now arises as to whether this railroad service is too high. Are we paying an unreasonable amount for this work to-day? If we are, then it should be reduced; if we are not, then we should appropriate the necessary amount and stop there. I shall now attempt to show that this railroad service is not at the present time getting any such compensation as we have been led to believe. I ask members to give me their close attention, because I would like to disabuse the minds of the men here who think these roads are getting enormous prices for their work at this time. I have taken a good deal of trouble to ascertain and figure out just what several roads do get for carrying the mail as compared with their other work.

The mails are carried on passenger trains; fast trains. This is as it should be. People can not get their mails too soon. Let us examine a few routes and see what the compensation is. Take the route from Bowling Green, Ky., to Memphis, Tenn., two hundred and sixty-two miles; it carries 7,693 pounds of mail per day, receiving $199.22 per mile. This is the amount of pay the road would receive for carrying eleven passengers the same distance at 3 cents a mile. Understand me, eleven passengers running over that road the entire distance would pay just the same amount of money that this road now gets for carrying the mail. But they furnish space for the mail which would suffice for sixty passengers. They carry the weight of fifty-three passengers, and yet only get pay for eleven passengers.

Take the road from Portland to Wallula, in Oregon; they carry 6,596 pounds of mail. They get $187.25 per year per mile of track. That is, they get pay for carrying the mail, which is less than nine passengers would pay for the same distance. Understand me, nine passengers riding where the mail passenger now rides would bring more money than the railroad gets for carrying him all this 6,596 pounds of mail a mile. They furnish space for nineteen passengers. They carry the weight of forty-five passengers, and only get the pay for about nine. Is that extravagant pay?

Mr. WEAVER. How much would it be putting it on the basis of steers?

Mr. HORR. We could not do that; steers do not occupy the place of passengers—do not go thirty miles an hour. No man will claim that the mails should be carried at the rates paid for heavy freight on slow trains. Again, the road between Atlanta and Chattanooga gets $293.49 a mile. They get pay for less than fourteen passengers. That road furnishes space for the mail, which would carry one hundred and twenty passengers, and carries the weight of sixty-one passengers, and only gets the pay for fourteen. The road from Springfield, Mo., to Memphis, Tenn.—two hundred and eighty-six miles long—that road runs seven trips a week, and it gets now $72.86 a mile. When I say seven trips, I mean over the road and back seven times a week. Four passengers over that road would bring more money than they now get for carrying the entire mail.

Mr. ROWELL. You mean four passengers per trip?

Mr. HORR. Certainly. At 3 cents a mile. I take it for granted it would be 3 cents a mile. There are no roads in the Southern States where they carry passengers for less than 3 cents a mile, are there?

Mr. AIKEN. None.

Mr. HORR. The roads do this mail work in the South for about the amount that would be paid for carrying three passengers, and they furnish the space for from ten to sixteen and carry the weight of from five to seven. Now take the large road from Buffalo to Cleveland. We will allow only 2 cents a mile there. Sixty-two passengers would pay for what they get for carrying the mails. They furnish a space that would accommodate over five hundred passengers, and they carry the weight of five hundred and thirty passengers and only get the pay for sixty-two passengers. You see the large roads figure that way because they carry an enormous amount of weight, this road averaging daily over 89,000 pounds, which figures up faster for them than for the small roads.

The road from Washington to Evansville carries only one hundred and twenty-six pounds of mail, for which it gets $42.75.

I wish you would look to this carefully, because this applies to the small roads all over the country. They get the pay now for just two passengers, that is, on nearly half the railroad routes where the mails run two passengers would bring the roads as much as they now get for carrying the mails. They carry a weight of from two to eight passengers over these small roads, and they furnish a space of from six to ten and sometimes as high as eighteen. But none of them get any more per mile than would be paid for carrying two passengers over the route. That is to say, these railroads furnish from six to thirteen linear feet of space; under this bill they can not go above thirteen. Some furnish as low as six. A linear foot is a space one foot long and the width of the car. These small roads furnish apartments of different dimensions. Six by twelve is a common room, but I reduce them all to the equivalent of linear feet, which is one foot by eight and one-half feet, or eight and one-half square feet—but it amounts to that when figured. Now, the roads to-day which get $42.75 only get the pay for carrying two passengers, and they carry one, the post-office messenger. So they furnish—now mark you—they furnish this space, run the car, heat it, light it, deliver the mails to the post-offices on the route and bring it from the post-offices back to the cars unless it is over a quarter of a mile distance, and for that whole work they can only get what they would get for carrying one passenger.

Mr. RYAN. Two passengers.

Mr. HORR. No; they carry one man, the post-office messenger. They get what one passenger would come to, and this bill steps in and takes out of that class of roads a million of dollars.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. HORR. Certainly.

Mr. ANDERSON. Have you made any comparison between freight and passengers?

Mr. HORR. I have not, nor would it be fair to do so. I have, however, compared it with rates received by railroad companies from express companies, and it is less than one-half what the express companies pay the railroad companies.

Mr. ANDERSON. Well, then, it ought to be divided by about four to get it down under the limits of grand larceny according to the rates in my part of the country. But the small roads get this rate for carrying this mail in the baggage-car.

Mr. HORR. Yes; the mails are carried in the baggage-car on the routes which carry but little, but the car is run on the passenger train and run at the same speed as passengers. I do not care how you figure it, if you will be accurate you can not help seeing that the small roads are inadequately paid.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask the gentleman a question in this connection.

Mr. HORR. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is it not conceded that on the great trunk lines, the larger lines of road, there is an increase of pay by this provision?

Mr. HORR. Yes; it is so conceded by the commission who placed the rate at 5 mills per foot.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is there any dispute in the committee that on a few of the lines where the largest mail is carried there is a considerable increase?

Mr. HORR. There is no doubt about it whatever under the 5-mill rate, and under the 4-mill it is about even; some of them would get considerably more and some get less than now.

Mr. BLOUNT. But on the largest is it not true that there is an increase even under the 4-mill rate? I understand my friend to say that on the Pennsylvania Central, which is one of the largest in the country, there is an increase?

Mr. HORR. Yes, sir. And so there would be on the road from New York to Philadelphia, and also over the New York Central.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then if there is an increase on the larger lines there must be a decrease somewhere.

Mr. HORR. Undoubtedly. I have tried to state with mathematical exactness that this falls heavily on those roads that run but six or seven trips a week.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am agreeing with the gentleman, for it seems to me the conclusion is inevitable.

Mr. HORR. There is no doubt about it in the world. That is just what I am trying to demonstrate here; there is no other conclusion that can be reached.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the gentleman yield to me for another question?

Mr. HORR. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. At present the law provides for what is known as the fast-mail service of the East, West, and South. In our sparsely settled country in the South that fast mail saves at least one day in business. How will this bill affect that fast-mail service on our roads?

Mr. HORR. As the bill came to us from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads it provided for fast mails by permitting the Postmaster-General to add 50 per cent. to the regular rates for securing that service to which the gentleman alludes. That was a permission which could be extended over the entire United States in the discretion of the Department.

I opposed that provision, because I thought the latitude was too great, and suggested to our subcommittee that it would be better to strike out that clause and leave in the $250,000 which we appropriated for that purpose as being a much safer and more feasible plan. They agreed with me, and so we struck out the 50 per cent., but when we got to the $250,000 they struck that out also. [Laughter.] So that we have now nothing whatever in this bill for the fast-train service referred to by the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Does the gentleman from Michigan say that there is nothing to give an inducement for the fast-mail service to these railroads?

Mr. HORR. For what is called the daily fast-mail service, for which we gave $250,000 last year, there is not a shilling of provision made in this bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But does not the gentleman admit that the provision which proposes an increase of one-tenth mill for each two miles additional speed over the ordinary rate of twenty miles per hour is an inducement to the roads to increase their speed?

Mr. HORR. The gentleman will bear me out in this, that that amounts to but a small part of what the roads get for carrying this fast mail. I will tell you what the exact amount is, and then I will show you why this bill does not cover this fast service which we were talking about at all.

Under the present law the road from New York to New Haven gets $17,647.06; the New York Central and Hudson River road gets $25,000 out of the $250,000. These are the only two roads in that section of the country that get anything. Then comes the Wilmington and Baltimore road, $20,000; Baltimore and Potomac road, $21,900; Quantico and Richmond, $17,419; Richmond to Petersburg, $14,197.50; Petersburg to Weldon, $11,680; Weldon to Wilmington, $29,565; Wilmington to Florence, $20,075; Florence to Charleston Junction, $17,337; Charleston Junction to Savannah, $19,062; Savannah to Jacksonville, Fla., $30,358; and the line put on last year from Baltimore to Hagerstown, $15,758.

Now, I wish my friend from Illinois to give me his attention, because he undertakes to make us think that this bill provides for this same fast service. True, this bill allows one-tenth of a mill for every two miles of speed run over the ordinary rate of twenty miles per hour, so that if a road runs forty miles an hour it would get 1 mill extra; that is, 5 mills instead of 4 per linear foot.

Mr. MONEY. Five mills for thirty miles, is it not?

Mr. HORR. No; it is five-tenths up to thirty, and 1 mill up to forty.

Mr. MONEY. Yes; one-half a cent up to thirty.

Mr. HORR. No; one half a mill up to thirty.

Now here is the difficulty: When you add that speed on these roads, all except these two Northern roads, and figure their pay, you will find at 4 mills they will still get less than they are getting now for carrying the ordinary mails. You will cut them down to this point; and still the gentleman says we are providing for this fast mail when these roads will not get as much for carrying it at forty miles an hour as they now get for carrying it at the ordinary rate of speed.

I hope the gentleman will explain then how this bill provides for special fast mails.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I neglected a moment ago to call the gentleman's attention to another additional element which enables the roads under the new system to get larger compensation than under the old; and that is the element of frequency. The figures the gentleman from Michigan gave me the other day as to the Charleston and Savannah road, which is one of the longest in the southern line of special mail-facility roads, were that under the old law that road got $259.09 a mile, but under the new law they would get $321.20; a gain of $62, without one single dollar of appropriation for special mail facilities.

Mr. HORR. Certainly; but you have cut that down one mill, and so cut out the very money you are talking about.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I know that. But the additional appropriation is produced by two elements—speed and frequency—and that road, according to the gentleman's figures, gets $62.11 more than under the present law.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] is not that estimate based on the assumption that the road makes two round trips a day?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Yes, sir; that is what they do make under the present arrangement.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is in consequence of their being paid to run one fast mail train a day. If you stop what is known as the fast mail on the poor roads that do not make but seven round trips a week, I would like to know what inducement the railroad companies would have to make two trips.

Mr. HORR. I hope the gentleman will hurry.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will answer the gentleman from South Carolina, if I am permitted to do so. I have mentioned the inducement we give the roads—an additional compensation for every two miles of speed above the ordinary rate of twenty miles an hour. And then there is the frequency of carrying the postal cars over the line, which, as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] figured it out, on the basis of 5 mills, will give the Charleston and Savannah road $62.11 per mile per annum over and above the present compensation.

Mr. HORR. Now, if the gentleman from Illinois will give his attention, I will show him where he fails mathematically. This road now gets $259.09 a mile. If you figure on the basis of 5 mills, then it will get $321.20. That is, they would have gained under that rule $6,001.85. They now get $19,000 for fast-mail service. But you have cut down the rate per foot to four mills and five-tenths of a mill for speed. So that at that rate, adding the speed, they will get only $262.80 per mile. And if the bill passes they get just about the same as they are getting now, and have not a shilling to carry the mails with on the fast trains, just as I stated in the start. It is a matter of arithmetic, and the gentleman from Illinois knows very well that when he struck out the 50 per cent. discretionary power given the Postmaster-General in the bill proposed by the commission he purposely failed to provide for this special fast-mail service.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I want to say to the gentleman from Michigan his arithmetic is wrong. In the first place his figures are wrong. I made an investigation last night from the tables accompanying the report of the Superintendent of the railway mail service. He has estimated the amount of the present compensation per mile for that road considerably higher than what it is. The figures show it amounts to only $212.06 under the present law.

Mr. HORR. The gentleman is mistaken. I took my weights carried from the Postmaster-General's report, and my calculation is correct.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I took mine also from the Postmaster-General's report; but you have made a mistake in your figures.

Mr. HORR. The book is right here, and I can show the gentleman that my calculation is correct.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Allowing for postal-car service and present weight, it amounts to only $212.06. The gentleman from Michigan says on the basis of 5 mills a mile it amounts to $312.20 under the law; a difference of about $110 a mile.

Mr. HORR. Will not your bill, when amended, cut down the rate?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Our bill will cut it down one-fifth, and with that cutting down they still get $100 a mile more.

Mr. HORR. I beg the gentleman's pardon. His results are not correct. I have been interrupted, Mr. Chairman, and I desired to be; but I trust the committee will allow me to complete my remarks. My time must be nearly exhausted.

My friend from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] seems very anxious to have me talk longer about the big roads which have frequent trips. By one of these rates they will gain a little. By the 5-mill plan they will gain a good deal. Of the Western roads through the gentleman's State, the Santa Fé road will lose largely by this bill. The Union Pacific lines will lose, as I have shown, several hundred thousand dollars if this bill becomes a law. It takes the money away—and that, I know, will please my friend from Kansas—from the Gould roads. But how would he like to have it put it into the pockets of the Vanderbilt system?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think the gentleman did not understand my question. He has given us some interesting statistics in regard to several roads, and stated he would give us the statistics in regard to the effect of these several propositions upon the leading trunk lines. Now I am very anxious or at least desirous to hear those statistics showing what effect this will have on the Vanderbilt system, the Gould system, the Chicago road—all those big fellows.

Mr. HORR. I have shown the facts already.

Mr. ANDERSON. What I want is the statistical statement as to those roads.

Mr. HORR. I am compelled to say to my friend from Kansas that the report of the New York Central has just reached me, and it is not in such shape that I can state exactly the results.

Mr. ANDERSON. All right.

Mr. HORR. But I do know philosophically, mathematically, that it will increase the compensation of that road enormously at the 5-mill rate and considerably at the 4-mill rate. It must do so on account of the great number of trips made over that line. I know that wherever a road makes only one trip a day, six trips a week, this plan will be ruinous to it.

Mr. ANDERSON. I want the figures. That is what I am after.

Mr. HORR. I have given enough figures to establish the principle. But, Mr. Chairman, there are some other features in this bill upon which I desire to make some comment. I am in favor of continuing the fast-mail service through that sparsely settled country in the South.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the gentleman will permit me a suggestion I will remind him that the poor roads through the sparsely settled portions of the country will be compelled to make two trips a day if they are to carry a fast mail, because their local business compels them to stop at every depot. With the pay heretofore given for fast-mail service they have been able to run a fast-mail train.

Mr. HORR. Certainly. I say that under this bill you will get no fast mail in that part of the country, and moreover it was not the intention that you should.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is my understanding of it.

Mr. HORR. There can not be any doubt about that.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in order that gentlemen may understand and appreciate the importance of this bill I wish to submit a few more figures. The whole number of railroad mail-routes in the United States is 1,634. The number of routes that receive less than $43, or $42.75, is 605. The number that receive less than $51 is 168. Therefore this bill reduces 773 routes down to $35 per mile, though the committee tell me that they are going to raise it to $40 per mile. Every road now receiving $80 per mile will get only $35 or $40 under this plan, except a few that make over seven trips a week. There are only 861 routes that get over $81. If this bill now stands at 4 mills per foot one-half of those will get about what they are getting now. Those are the large routes, which are now getting pretty good pay. The smaller routes will be reduced. So that nearly every dollar saved by this bill will come out of the poor railroads that are now getting for carrying the mail no more than they get for carrying one passenger, for they carry a railroad mail-clerk all the time anyway.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question? How much less would the majority of the small roads get under this bill than under the present law?

Mr. HORR. If you put in your amendment of 4 mills and of $40 the small roads will get $2.75 less. But there are over three hundred roads that get between that and $80, every one of which your bill will cut down to $40.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But a majority of the roads get only $42.75.

Mr. HORR. Yes; a majority of the small roads get only $42.75.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. And some of them do not get as much as $35 under the present law.

Mr. HORR. Only a half-dozen or so, which does not amount to anything in the discussion of this bill. To the roads that now get $42.75 this bill proposes to give $40; but there is a large number of roads that get from $50 to $80 which this would cut down to $40; also roads that carry now four hundred, five hundred, six hundred, seven hundred, or eight hundred pounds of mail.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, if I can be recognized now I will yield a portion of my time to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] to enable him to finish his speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] is recognized.

Mr. RYAN. I yield so much of my time to Mr. HORR as he may need to finish his remarks.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, I will say that the commission that was appointed by the Post-Office Department to prepare this bill made the minimum limit $35. We have raised that minimum limit to $40 a mile. It is true that we have lowered the rate per mile from 5 to 4 mills, but that does not affect these roads. This $40-limit protects all those roads, and we have raised the limit from $35 to $40. I wished to make that statement in justice to the committee.

Mr. HORR. If $42.75 is such a meager amount, such a mere pittance, for the service now, why do you propose to cut it down at all?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. In reply to that, Mr. Chairman, I will say that I do not think that $42.75 is a very meager pittance for the amount and character of the service. Furthermore, we leave open the opportunity for these small lines, as they grow and as the business of the country through which they pass grows, to get a higher compensation than $40 per mile.

Mr. HORR. Mr. Chairman, having, as I believe, shown clearly that the present plan of compensating the railroads for their service had better be adhered to, at any rate until we can devise a plan that will be better understood than this new plan seems to be, and having also shown that the roads are now doing their work at a low price, I desire now to speak briefly of some of the other provisions in this bill.

In the first place, the committee here cut down the estimate for the railway clerks. They have cut down that appropriation until it is wholly inadequate for the service during the next year. There are now 56 of those clerks who get $1,400 a year; there are 519 that get $1,300; there are 518 that get $1,150; there are 1,408 that get $1,000; and there are 800 that get from $900 down to $810, and there are 740 that get from $800 down to $100, but 497 of those get $800 per year. Under the provision of the law the maximum salary of these clerks is fixed. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the worst thing that this country can do, or rather the worst thing this House can do for the country, is to cut down the mail clerks and cut down their salaries, because they are really the key to the whole railroad-mail system.

I know that my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] differs with me as to the amount that these clerks should receive. I am frank to confess that I prepare a bill of this kind with different feelings, different emotions, from my friend from Indiana. We view this work from different standpoints, we carry into it different habits of thought, different notions of public duty and public expediency. The question which always occurs to me when I am preparing the appropriation for so important a service as this is, first, what is the work that we call upon these men to do; second, what salary will procure for the Government the best and most perfect service? It is not only arduous work, it is dangerous work these railway clerks are asked to perform. If my memory serves me right, seven of these railway postal clerks have been killed by accident within the last year; about fifty of them, perhaps, have met with injuries more or less severe. Yet, when we come to form the appropriation bill for the payment of these clerks, my friend from Indiana insists that they get too much pay for their work,

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Did I understand the gentleman to state that we had cut down the amount of appropriation for postal railway clerks?

Mr. HORR. Yes; it is cut down below the estimate.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Not below the appropriation for the present year?

Mr. HORR. Certainly not.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. We give an increase of nearly $200,000 upon the present year.

Mr. HORR. But that increase is so small as absolutely to prevent—and the gentleman from Indiana intended to do it; he will not disavow it—to prevent these clerks from getting the amount of pay that the law allows them. But, as I was saying, while I always ask the question, "What is this service worth?" my friend from Indiana always seems to be asking "Is it not possible to get some fellow to do this job for a few cents less? Can we not cut off 5 cents from each of these men and yet not touch the starvation point?" [Laughter.]

Now, the appropriation for railway clerks in this bill is so small that you can not pay the present service of the men now engaged at the salaries fixed by law.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. That is practical repudiation, is it not?

Mr. HORR. There have been built this year 6,000 miles of new railroad upon which this service ought to go.

No more faithful men live than these hard-worked railway clerks, and of all the men in the public service they are the last who should be reduced in this way.

Mr. Chairman, the next reduction I will call the attention of the House to is the star-route service. In this item there is a reduction of—$200,000, is it not [turning to Mr. TOWNSHEND]?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. On the estimates; not on the appropriations of last year.

Mr. HORR. I am talking about the estimates—the amount the men who have this work in charge say is needed to meet the proper demands of that branch of the postal system.

Now, an increase of the railroad service does not, as a person might at first think, decrease the star-route service. It is assumed by some people that as we increase service by rail the service by horses diminishes. But this assumption is not true; it overlooks the fact that when you run a railroad through a country intersecting post-routes come into existence by the dozen from little towns springing up all over that section of the country. Thus the increase of the star service always keeps pace with the railroad service. And this bill is so drawn as to prevent the natural increase of the star-route service in these sparsely populated places. The people living in these towns need their mail—their letters and their newspapers—just as much as those who live in the large cities. These horseback mails should be provided for with the greatest care. They reach the pioneers of this country, the men who crowd our civilization out into the wilderness, perhaps only once a week, but that once a week is a good deal to those brave, hardy people. I would provide amply for this service. This bill lacks $200,000 of doing that.

Again, the Committee on Appropriations has cut down the estimate for carriers something more than $400,000. I did everything I could to prevent it. At the last session we had this same fight in this House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman will allow me to correct him. We have cut down the estimate only $50,000, and we have given for letter-carriers $50,000 increase on the appropriation of last year.

Mr. BINGHAM. The estimate is four and a half million of dollars.

Mr. HORR. The committee has cut down the estimates for the letter-carriers $435,000. Now, this work, as everybody understands, is done by men who labor as faithfully and work as hard as any men in the United States. The amount which the committee propose to appropriate is more than $200,000 less than is needed to keep the service right where it is to-day.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I know the gentleman does not want to do injustice to his own committee, and I wish to show that he is mistaken. The amount asked for letter-carriers and free-delivery service was $4,100,000. We have given $4,050,000—a reduction of only $50,000 below the estimate of the Department.

Mr. HORR. The gentleman is mistaken. I can not see how you can claim any such thing.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. In this connection I wish to state that the expenditure last year for this service was only $3,504,000. We increase the appropriation for the next year half a million dollars above the expenditure of last year.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] will read his own report he will see that the Department asks for $4,535,000 for the letter-carriers and expenses of free-delivery system, while this bill recommends an appropriation of only $4,100,000.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I admit the gentleman's correction as to the estimate; but we give over $500,000 more than was expended during the year ending the 30th of last June. I was mistaken about the estimates.

Mr. HORR. I do not like to take so much time; but since the gentleman has brought up this letter-carrier business, and seems so strenuous about it, let me give him some exact information. There are now 2,236 carriers, at $1,000 a year; 1,084, at $850; 333, at $800; 684, at $600; making 4,337, who receive in the aggregate $3,834,200. Of the 684 receiving $600 each now, 337, under the act passed a few years ago, will receive an increase up to $800 per year, which will take $75,400; and 307 will be increased to $850 each, making $76,750. Three hundred and thirty-three go from $800 to $1,000 a year, which takes $66,600. Then add for increase in cost of service on account of vacations given them by law last year, and it takes $115,000 to provide for that. Then add for incidentals $130,000, and it takes to keep the force just as it now is $4,297,950; that is nearly $200,000 more than this bill carries, and less than is needed, if we do not put another carrier on or do any thing to increase this service.

But, Mr. Chairman, New York city has already applied for increase of a large number of carriers. Several hundred carriers scattered all over the country are actually needed in addition to those now employed in order to bring the service up to where it will be good and efficient, and yet this committee undertake to run this important service with $200,000 next year less than it will take to make legal payments if we do not add another carrier to the force.

Now, this bill has cut down the entire estimates over $3,000,000. If my friend from Illinois will look at it, he will see how absurd it is. This bill only appropriates about $700,000 in the entire bill more than it will take for the entire post-office service this current year. The post-office service increases every year about 8 per cent.; that would call for some $4,000,000 of increase for this year over last year. It is idle for anybody to talk about doing this extra 8 per cent. work for nothing. It must be paid for. Seven hundred thousand dollars can not supply an increase of $4,000,000. This country will rue the day when we get so we can make as small an appropriation for the post-office service in one year as we did the year before, because that will be a sure indication that decay has set in, that progress has stopped, that growth is at an end in this nation of ours.

The appropriations for the postmasters are cut down here below the estimate some $700,000. The gentleman will remember I labored hard to get this House to fix an amount for the postmasters and an amount for the railway service last year up to the estimates. You voted me down. The Senate put it in; we did not yield; they yielded. We struck it out, and the gentleman from Illinois well knows the deficiencies are already known for this year to be just about the amount cut out in that bill last year.

I wish to say one additional word and then I will be done. In preparing this appropriation bill I have sought only to give such amounts as will be needed for good service in this department of the Government. We are not going on this side of the House to expend this money. You gentlemen are going to have the control of it. If you think you can do this work for three or four million dollars less than the men who have been managing this business for twenty-five years tell you it will take to run it try it on, but do not say I came in and undertook to give you inadequate means with which to perform this work. I desire the appropriations to meet the wants of the people. The people pay for this service. The estimate of the Department this year is that we shall raise $51,000,000 by postage alone.

Yet on the eve of the change to lower postage they reduce the service to about $52,000,000. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] must know, and my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] must know, that this bill simply means a deficiency of $2,500,000 next year. It means either that, or it means such a crippling of this service as the people of this country do not wish, nor will they submit to it in any degree of quietness or good feeling. The people pay for this service directly. The men who use the mails pay for the work.

Then, I say, give them such sums as will make it a perfect service. It has come to be very common to criticise and ridicule any work done by the Government. People, and some members here, seem to take great pleasure in defaming any management of national affairs. Still, the postal service of the United States, in my judgment, is one of the best managed and most successful business institutions known to the world. When you take into account its vast machinery, its immense number of operatives, the nooks and corners of the continent it must search out and serve, the innumerable number of packages it must care for and send in the proper direction, the precision of its deliveries and the accuracy of its every-day transactions become truly wonderful. I assert that private enterprise never excelled in perfect work at so low a price the labor that is being daily performed by our 80,000 post-office officials and employés.

No doubt that now and then there have been grave irregularities. Corrupt rings have probably been formed from time to time and frauds perpetrated. What vast work in this world has ever yet been free from such incidents? Such crimes should always be exposed and the perpetrators speedily punished. But these exceptions do not invalidate the statement that our postal service is one of the most perfect systems that human intellect can devise and human energy and integrity execute. Such perfection can not be reached in a day. It is, it necessarily must be, the outgrowth of years of intelligent management, of patient, severe labor, and in all this complicated work the duties of the postal railway clerk are exceptional. Not every man can fill that position. Natural adaptability to the work, opportunity and experience alone can do this work well. Hence it is a class of work that should command good pay.

It matters not whether the employés of this Department be Democrats or Republicans, they should be compensated for the work performed. You gentlemen are about to assume the responsibilities of this service. My hope is that you will perform its duties well, for it is a service that affects every family fireside in the land. It is pre-eminently the service that touches all the people; and, for one, I am determined that the means shall be adequate for the work to be performed.

Mr. Chairman, I have detained the House much longer than I intended. Permit me to thank the members for their kind attention, and, in conclusion, to express the hope that after this bill shall have received careful consideration by this Committee of the Whole it will be amended and passed in such shape as will meet the demands of a great service, that now requires over $50,000,000 to meet its honest necessities.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WORTHINGTON in the chair). The gentleman has forty minutes remaining.

Mr. RYAN. I reserve that time, and permit the gentleman from Indiana to take the floor if he desires to be heard now.

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. AIKEN].

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. Chairman, familiar as I am with the working of the third-class post-offices of this country, and with the necessity they have for clerical hire, I had determined after reading this bill to propose to the House to increase the amount allowed for clerical service in such offices.

But, sir, having examined carefully the annual report of the Post-Office Department, I am clearly of the conviction that if the present amount which is appropriated were more equitably distributed we would have more clerks in the third-class offices, and the postmasters themselves would not be required to take their own salaries to pay for clerical help.

I have looked, sir, somewhat critically over the Postmaster-General's report for 1884, which is the last public document we have from that Department, and I find that the money appropriated for clerk-hire is distributed with a discretionary power that seems to me to have no rule or regulation connected with it.

I should probably first call the attention of the committee to the fact that these post-offices throughout the United States are classified. We have first-class, second-class, third-class, and fourth-class offices. There is no statutory requirement that either one of these classes shall have so much or so little clerical help, or that any specific amount shall be allowed each for clerk-hire; but the law does require that the postmasters in these respective classes of offices shall have a specified salary. In the third-class offices the salary must be one thousand dollars and less than two thousand; in the second-class the salary must be two thousand and less than three thousand; and in the first-class the salary must be three thousand and less than four thousand dollars, with one or two exceptions, which have been fixed by law. I learn from the Postmaster-General's report that this law has not been complied with.

Finding this to be the case, I was induced to examine the disbursements of the appropriations for clerk-hire in these three classes known as the Presidential offices. Selecting some of the first-class offices, where the amount of mail matter to be distributed can not vary very materially from different States as well as from the same State, and comparing them, I find as follows: At Sacramento, Cal., the clerk-hire amounts to $9,920, while at Bridgeport, Conn., the clerk-hire is only $7,671, or $2,300 less; and yet when I look at the gross receipts I find that the receipts at Bridgeport are $8,000 more than at Sacramento, and that it pays into the Treasury $7,500 more of net revenue to the Government than Sacramento.

I find that at Evansville, Ind., the amount paid for clerk-hire is $7,180, while at Peoria, Ill., it is $6,440 only; and yet Peoria has a gross income of $30,000 more than Evansville, and pays into the Treasury of the Government a net revenue of $27,000 more than Evansville.

Mr. HORR. Let me ask the gentleman from South Carolina whether he knows how these two points compare in the distribution of the mails?

Mr. AIKEN. That is a point which I tried to examine, but could not arrive at any conclusion from the report.

Mr. VALENTINE. Let me suggest to the gentleman from South Carolina that I do not think the receipts of the office are any test at all for the amount paid for clerk-hire. The only test, in fact, is as to the amount required for the distribution of the mails.

Mr. AIKEN. I understand that to be the case generally, but in these first-class offices there must be additional clerical help, for the postmaster of a first-class office could not possibly handle the mail received at the office without assistance, and the gross receipts in a degree indicate the amount of mail matter handled in the office, even though it be no distributing office. But all these first-class offices are alike distributing offices.

Mr. VALENTINE. I know that in some offices in my own State the postmasters have to pay for clerk-hire for distribution of the mails out of their own salaries.

Mr. AIKEN. Why?

Mr. VALENTINE. Because Congress does not furnish the money to pay it.

Mr. AIKEN. If the gentleman will allow me to state what I get from the annual report of the Post-Office Department, he will see there is some irregularity about it. There is some imposition upon the third-class postmasters and the third-class offices in my judgment. They do not get what is due them.

Mr. VALENTINE. I believe that too.

Mr. CANNON. As I understand it, none of the third-class post-offices get clerk-hire. They can only get an allowance for separating the mails, and that is limited, whereas from $2,000 up they get clerk-hire.

Mr. AIKEN. What, then, is meant by clerk-hire? As set forth in this report there are 1,620 third-class offices that get clerk-hire.

Mr. CANNON. That is for separating the mail. But they get nothing for clerk-hire proper.

Mr. AIKEN. Why, sir, there are some of these third-class post-offices that get more for clerk-hire than they pay revenue to the Government.

Mr. CANNON. For separating the mails.

Mr. AIKEN. I do not care what it is for. It is work under the Post-Office Department. But this report of the Postmaster-General calls it clerk-hire.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me I will state this: Take two offices. One pays $1,900; the other $2,000. The $2,000 office, suppose it takes one extra man, gets an allowance for clerk-hire for that extra man. The $1,900 office does not get a cent of allowance and can not get under the law. That is all I say.

Mr. AIKEN. You mean the office with $1,900 salary?

Mr. CANNON. Yes, sir.

Mr. AIKEN. Then no man that understands the English language can read that book and get an idea from it. But let me give this House some further little statistical discrepancies on this point; and it will all tend to show this distribution of money should not go in bulk. It should be divided among these various classes of offices.

I take the post-office of Syracuse, N. Y., which I take it is a distributing office. Syracuse has $122,000 of gross receipts. Then I take Troy, N. Y., which has $92,000 of gross receipts, a difference in gross receipts of $30,000. And yet they have identically the same amount for clerk-hire, $3,000. And Syracuse pays $33,000 more of net income to the Government than Troy does. I put it to any man of common sense whether Syracuse has not more necessity for clerical help than Troy. Yet the same amount is paid for clerk-hire, while the one pays $33,000 more of net income to the Government than the other.

Now take Portland, Oreg., and Harrisburg, Pa. Portland, Oreg., has $75,000 of gross receipts; Harrisburg, Pa., only $45,000. Yet at Harrisburg $600 more is paid for clerical help than at Portland, Oreg.

Mr. HORR. There are a great many roads which meet at Harrisburg, and it supplies a thickly settled country.

Mr. AIKEN. I know that a thickly settled country is supplied there. But go farther South to a sparsely settled country. If it is a thickly settled country in the vicinity of Harrisburg, and more is required there for clerical help, we will go to the State of Texas. At Austin, Tex., there are $38,000 of gross receipts; at Dallas, $44,000. Both are central points where railroads meet; and yet Austin, with $6,000 less of gross receipts and $4,000 less of net receipts, gets $800 more for clerical help.

Mr. VALENTINE. That is easily explained.

Mr. AIKEN. I have not time to yield to the gentleman. It is not explained in this book. I understand what a distributing office is. I have been in them and know all about them.

Take Norfolk, Va., and Wheeling, W. Va. Norfolk, Va., ought in my judgment to be considered more of a distributing office than Wheeling. Wheeling is on a line of railroad going north and south and east and west. We have similar roads centering at Norfolk. It supplies a large section of country. Norfolk has $28,000 of net revenue. Wheeling has $20,000; but Wheeling gets $10,000 for clerical help and Norfolk gets $7,000—a difference of $3,000.

These are all first-class post-offices. I will only instance one from the second-class. I will take Waverly, N. Y. Is it a distributing office? The gross receipts are only $7,338. It gets but $370 for clerk-hire. I suppose that is for a man to assist in distributing. Penn Yan has $7,351 of gross receipts; only a few dollars more than Waverly. It gets $1,216 for clerk-hire, nearly $1,000 more.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. They have more to do there. That is right.

Mr. AIKEN. Now, I will say one thing further. In examining this report I was baffled when I attempted anything like a mathematical calculation. The Postmaster-General says that on the 30th day of June, 1884, there were eighty-four first-class post-offices in the United States. In another part of his report he enumerates them, and there are but seventy-eight, making a difference of six. He says there are four hundred and four second-class post-offices. I ran over the list, counted them, and there are but four hundred and one. He says there are 2,323 third-class offices, and he refers you to the list. I went over the list and found the number 2,161, being one hundred and sixty-two less than the number stated.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that led me to another idea.

A MEMBER. May there not have been changes since those figures were given?

Mr. AIKEN. No, sir; there can not have been any changes. These figures are all of the same date, and the Postmaster-General refers you to the section of his report where you will find these figures. He states that the gross receipts from these (as he says 2,323, but as I say 2,161) post-offices are over $33,000,000. I have added them up, aggregated them by States and individual offices, and I find that they do not aggregate $32,000,000.

Now I come to a point which I wish to impress upon the House, and it is the point which suggested these remarks. The clerical help in the first-class offices amounts to $3,465,859, which is 18 per cent. of the gross receipts of those offices and 26 per cent. of their net receipts. The clerical help of the second-class post-offices amounts to $820,592, which is only 14 per cent. of their gross revenue and 24 per cent. of the net revenue. But when we examine the third-class post-offices we find that their gross receipts are more than $500,000 in excess of the gross receipts of the second-class offices, and they pay $2,690,897 net revenue to the Government; yet their clerical help amounts to only 7 per cent. of their gross receipts, and less than 17 per cent. of their net receipts. Now I think I am warranted in saying that that is not an equitable distribution of this money which is given to the Postmaster-General for his discretionary disbursement.

I notice another fact, sir; that the clerk-hire recorded in this report averages $575 to each office, taking the entire list; but of that total number there are one hundred and seventy-three third-class post-offices that receive for clerical hire $100 or less than $100, while five hundred and eighty receive nothing at all; and I know of my own knowledge of more than half a dozen offices that are distributing offices where the postmaster has to work both day and night; and I know of one or two instances where money is paid directly from the salary of a third-class postmaster for help, because he finds it impossible otherwise to perform the duties required of him.

Mr. VALENTINE. That is the case all over the country.

Mr. AIKEN. Why should it be so? It is wrong. There ought to be a sufficient appropriation made to put an end to that state of things.

Mr. VALENTINE. That is what I propose to help you to do.

Mr. AIKEN. Now a few words about salaries, and then I shall submit the amendment which I propose to offer at the proper time to this bill. I begin with the Sacramento office, California. The net receipts of that office were $22,342, and the salary of the postmaster is $3,075; while Oakland, Cal., which gives a net return of $12,000 more, is only a second-class office and the salary of the postmaster is $2,925. There is no distribution in that case. That is regulated by law. The law provides that every post-office shall have a certain standing in its class, and that according to its standing in the class the postmaster shall receive a salary of $1,000 or over, $2,000 or over, or $3,000 or over. Here, then, is the case of an office where the postmaster gets a salary of over $3,000, yet which does not do much more than half as much business as is done by another which is put in the second class. Again, take Quincy, Ill. The net revenue of that office is only $20,000, while Rockford, Ill., yields $29,000; yet Quincy is ranked as a first-class office, while Rockford is only a second-class office. Again, Evansville, Ind., yields a revenue of $19,000 a year and ranks as a first-class office with a salary of $3,000; Lincoln, Nebr., yields a revenue of $5,500 more, but it is only a second-class office. Still, strange to say, that second-class postmaster gets a salary of $3,000. How is that? The law provides that the salary of the postmaster at a second-class office shall be $2,000 and over, yet here is a postmaster in an office of the second-class who gets a salary of $3,000. Little Rock, Ark., pays a net revenue of only $16,684, but it is a first-class office, and the postmaster gets a salary of $6,000; Los Angeles, Cal., pays almost twice as much revenue to the Government, yet it is put down as a second-class office, and the salary of the postmaster is only $2,800.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. AIKEN. I ask the committee, as they have indulged the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR], to give me ten or twelve minutes more.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. AIKEN. To continue the comparison of these offices, Harrisburg, Pa., is put down as a first-class office, with a salary of $3,150. It pays only $24,000 net revenue, while Wilmington, Del., pays $1,000 more net revenue, yet the salary of the postmaster at Wilmington is $150 less than that of the Harrisburg postmaster. But still the postmaster at Wilmington gets a salary of $3,000, although the office is recorded as belonging to the second-class. What right has that postmaster to draw a salary of $3,000 when the law provides expressly that no postmaster shall draw that salary unless his is a first-class office? Again, take the office of Kankakee, Ill.; it is put down as a second-class office, with a salary of $2,250, while Joliet, another little town in that State, is put down as a third-class office, with a salary of $1,800; but Joliet yields $1,500 more revenue to the Government than Kankakee. Again, take Natick and Amesbury, in Massachusetts. One is set down as a second-class office and the other as a third-class office, but both postmasters get the same salary, $2,000.

Mr. VALENTINE. May not those apparent discrepancies be explained by the returns of gross revenue?

Mr. AIKEN. No, sir. The gross revenues are invariably less where I have stated the net revenues as less, but the salary is sometimes greater. Geneva and Glens Falls, N. Y., are both recorded as third-class offices, yet the salary of the postmaster in each is considerably over $2,000. What right has the Postmaster-General or anybody else to appropriate a salary of $2,000 to a postmaster of the third class in violation of the law? Again, Gloversville, N. Y., with net and gross revenues less than either Geneva or Glens Falls, is registered as a second-class post-office.

There are three second-class offices in Colorado whose gross receipts do not reach $6,000 each, and whose net revenue to the Government is each less than the salary paid the postmaster. The clerk-hire in one of these is more than its net revenue.

In Nevada there are two second-class offices, in each of which the sum of the salary of the postmaster and the clerk-hire exceeds the net income to the Government, and a third office of the second-class where the salary of the postmaster and the clerk-hire are each more than the net revenue to the Government.

Carthage, N. Y., with a gross income of only $3,535.69 and a net revenue to the Government less than the salary of the postmaster, is a second-class post-office, while Geneva, N. Y., with a gross income of $16,901.84 and a net revenue of $12,325.84, is a third-class post-office, though the postmaster has a salary of $2,575.

Meadville, Pa., with a gross income of $16,487.30, is a third-class post-office, though the salary of the postmaster is $2,500; and Sharon, Pa., with a gross income of only $7,809.92, is a second-class post-office, and the salary of the postmaster over $2,000.

Mr. Chairman, after considering all these irreconcilable inaccuracies it does seem to me we ought not to allow the sum of $5,100,000 to be appropriated in bulk to be distributed for clerical hire. Therefore, at the proper time, I propose to submit an amendment to add to the clause of the bill which I have been discussing the following:

Three million five hundred thousand dollars of which shall be paid to clerks in first-class offices, $900,000 to clerks in second-class offices, and $700,000 to clerks in third-class post-offices.

I return the floor to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], to whom I am much obliged for his kindness.

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserve the residue of my time.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, I take the floor not so much for the purpose of discussing the provisions of this bill as to call the attention of the House to the exact status of that business which this House must transact, if it would avoid an extra session of the Forty-ninth Congress. I have reference to the appropriation bills; and if I can have the attention of members and can make them thoroughly understand the status of their business, I believe we shall be in a better frame of mind to facilitate the passage of the appropriation bills remaining unacted upon; and if I should accomplish this result, I shall not have occupied the time in vain.

I doubt whether within the experience of the oldest member of the House the appropriation bills at a corresponding stage of any session of Congress have been in such a state of immaturity. Only one of the thirteen general appropriation bills has gone to the President. We have remaining but nineteen legislative days of this session, including the last day, the 4th of March. The fortification appropriation bill, the estimates for which are over $7,000,000, is still in the hands of a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations of this House, so that in fact the Committee on Appropriations has not considered it at all. The naval appropriation bill, the estimates for which are over $30,000,000, is still in the hands of a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations of this House, not having been acted on at all by the committee itself.

The sundry civil bill, the estimates for which are over $32,000,000, remains still in the hands of a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations of this House, the committee itself not having considered it at all. The deficiency bill, the estimates for which are over $8,000,000, remains still in the hands of a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations of the House, not having been acted on at all by the committee.

So that here are four of the most important of the general appropriation bills which have not yet been considered by the Committee on Appropriations. The Post-Office bill now under consideration must, as every member can foresee, occupy considerable time if it is to be fairly considered. The legislative bill, already reported, is next to be considered by the House.

Now a word as to the condition of the other appropriation bills. The pension bill has passed both Houses, and is now on the Speaker's table, the Senate amendments having yet to be considered.

The Military Academy bill is the only one, a little bill of $310,000, that has gone to the President. The consular and diplomatic appropriation bill, I believe, is ready for conference. The Indian appropriation bill is still in the hands of the Senate committee, not having been reported to the Senate at all. The Army appropriation bill is in the same condition. I ought to say, in passing, the pension bill to-day is under consideration in the Senate; but the Army appropriation bill is still in the Senate committee. The District of Columbia bill was reported back here to-day, and has been referred to the Committee on Appropriations of the House, that the Senate amendments may receive consideration. The agricultural appropriation bill is still in the Senate committee.

This, Mr. Chairman, is the condition of the appropriation bills to-day, and it would seem that the peril of an extra session is imminent, and this House, in order to avoid that and all its disastrous consequences to the business of the country, will be compelled to press on so rapidly that it can not give that consideration to these bills carrying over $200,000,000 they ought to receive at the hands of the representatives of the people. At the last session of Congress we were obliged to pass one of the most important of the appropriation bills, the sundry civil, under a suspension of the rules—a most reprehensible practice.

Now I want to call the attention of the House to the time we occupied at the last session of Congress in considering the bills which we are yet to consider in this House.

Mr. BLOUNT rose.

Mr. RYAN. Let me conclude this, and then I will answer questions. We occupied two days in the consideration of the deficiency bill. I have explained the status of that bill. It has not yet been acted on by the Committee on Appropriations. We occupied with the fortifications bill three days. We occupied three days in the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial bill. We occupied five days in considering the naval bill. We occupied five days in considering the Post-Office bill. We occupied, of course, but one day in considering the sundry civil bill, which in fact, we did not consider at all, having passed it under a suspension of the rules. Thus we occupied nineteen days at the last session of Congress in considering those bills which we have not considered at all at this session, and we have but twenty days remaining of the session.

Mr. VALENTINE. Not working days.

Mr. RYAN. Twenty legislative days is all we have remaining of the session, including the 4th of March.

Mr. VALENTINE. But you have to take out the day for the electoral count and the 22d of February.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Really only eighteen days left.

Mr. RYAN. Now the Senate requires as much time in considering these bills as the House. In justice to themselves and to the country they must consider every item of these appropriation bills—consider them in the committee, consider them in the Senate—and after that has been done they come back again to the House to receive consideration at least on the amendments which are made to them.

Much new legislation is upon many of these bills, and agreements are likely to take a considerable time.

I have thought it my duty, Mr. Chairman, to call the attention of the House to these important facts, that we may no longer than is necessary delay action on those bills which we must pass if we would avoid an extra session of Congress, and which I believe every man on this floor desires to avoid.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. Thirty minutes.

Mr. HAMMOND. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RYAN. With pleasure.

Mr. HAMMOND. Is it because the necessity was so great that we limited general debate on this bill to five hours?

Mr. RYAN. I wish to say to the gentleman from Georgia that the policy of pushing a bill through the House carrying $52,000,000 without debate is reprehensible in the highest degree, and any policy that compels the necessity of such a course on the part of the House is equally reprehensible.

I will reserve the balance of my time for the purpose of yielding it to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] when he desires to take it.

Mr. DUNHAM. Let the gentleman state to the House the facts about the delay of these appropriation bills—state to the House where the trouble is—who is to blame.

Mr. RYAN. The House is as competent to judge of that as I am.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. Chairman, as a great deal of the new legislation in this bill has been prepared by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, I desire the attention of the House for a few minutes until I can put forth, in as clear a manner and as briefly as I may be able, the reasons which actuated that committee in their report. It is impossible in the time allowed by my friend from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] to do more than touch upon the salient points of this bill. It will be impossible for me to go further than that provision in reference to the compensation of railroads for carrying the mails.

In the first place, it seems to me, from the speeches that I have listened to here to-day and heretofore on this floor, that the whole purpose of the great postal service of this country is entirely misunderstood. We have been told heretofore that the Post-Office Department of this country, by gentlemen who have debated the question, is conducted as a business.

We have been told that in some sections of the country this business was a great charge upon the people, because of the fact that the particular section of country in question did not pay in postage the expense of handling and transporting the mails.

We have been told that in other sections it was a lucrative business productive of revenue, and that it was a profitable business because that particular section paid more to the revenues of the country in the shape of postage than was expended for conducting the service.

In my view, sir, the Post-Office Department or the postal service of this country is one of the functions of this Government, and is not conducted as a business or a charity. In my judgment there should be no arrest of the development of the service because of the insufficiency of the revenue derived from postage. There is no country on the face of the earth that has a postal service at all that does not conduct it as a function of the government; and there is just as much right to assume that the other great functions of this Government are run as business enterprises, and that they should pay their expenses, as that the postal service should be required or expected to do so. For instance, it would be just as proper to say that Congress should pay all of its own expenses, that the judiciary should pay the expense connected therewith, and that the Army and Navy or any other branch of the Government should be required to pay its own expenses, as that the postal service should.

The only excuse for fixing postage at all is that it is a tax levied upon those who use the mails for the general purposes of Government, and not to conduct the Post-Office; that it is a tax of universal application and distribution, and that it is a tax of which no complaint has ever yet been made as to its levying. It is a tax levied for the general purposes of Government just as excise taxes and imposts are levied for the general purposes of Government, and the Post-Office Department is a function of the Government administered for the good of the whole people of this country, because it has been found necessary that the communication that built up the social and commercial relations of the several sections should be developed to the highest possible degree. And I say that there should be no limit to the revenues derived from this service. I mean that every single dollar expended in the service should be made to procure just as much as possible of the service demanded by it.

Now, in that view I undertake to address myself to this particular provision—the compensation allowed to railroads for mail transportation. The bill just submitted differs in some material respects from the law as it stands; and it is not a question, as stated by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR], of robbing the little roads or increasing in an inordinate degree the earnings of the larger roads, but it is simply a question of paying for the service which the Government gets. If the small railroad does not carry a large mail they should not get the pay for carrying a large mail.

Mr. HORR. It does not now.

Mr. MONEY. It does not now, because it does not carry the large mail, and therefore it should not get pay for that which it does not do. The railroads are not to be treated as objects depending upon the subsidy of the Government; and the Government should not be taxed to support a small road, nor should it withhold from the large roads that which they actually earn.

Now, the basis of pay, as formerly and now determined, is fixed by weight supplemented by space. It is complained of this bill or this amendment of the old law that frequency and speed are also items that enter into the calculation. That is exactly as it ought to be. If you have a star-route mail service running three times a week and you increase it to six times a week, it is a law that double compensation shall be paid for the increase; and is there any reason, if speed is valuable in a single instance on a star route for the transportation of a small portion of the mails of the United States, that the same reason should not be applied to railroads which convey 90 per cent. of the entire mails of the Union? In other words, is there any reason why the railroads transporting 10,000 pounds of mail per day should have as much pay as the road transporting 10,000 pounds twice a day? Not only that, sir, but in expediting the schedule, which has been the subject of investigation and also the cause of corruption in the administration of the contract office, there is the same element to be considered.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is the result of an investigation into the whole railway system of the United States by a commission of competent experts appointed by the Postmaster-General. In their investigation they took the average earnings of the railroads of the United States. Then they took the average earnings of the six great railway States of the United States, and they had correspondence which they had invited from almost all the great lines of the country.

It was ascertained that about 26½ cents per mile per car run was the cost of the passenger trains of the United States. That was the average. In the great State of Ohio, according to a late report by her commissioner of railroads, the earnings were 29.4 cents per mile; which is perhaps a fair sample of the business of the United States.

It was desirable that a just and reasonable compensation should be paid to the railroads for their services. This was particularly incumbent upon the Government, because it had not permitted a bidding by these roads; but by force of public opinion it exercises a compulsion upon them, and they are compelled to carry at whatever rates we pay. Having then both sides of the bargain in our own hands, we are under double obligation to be just and reasonable to them. It certainly would not do to pay these roads the price earned per car per mile run for freight, as suggested by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] in a question to the gentleman from Michigan; because all the expenses are different; the speed is different, delivery is different, and everything is different. But it is reasonable and it is just to pay to the roads the same price paid for passenger cars, because the cars supplied by the companies are expensive; they are better lighted and better heated and they run upon the same trains on which the passengers are carried. It is just and reasonable therefore to make the pay for the railway post-offices the same as for passengers. And it has been calculated that 25 cents per mile per car run is a just compensation, because it is a certain business, and while not quite as large as the average earnings, as shown by the reports of these several railroads in their passenger business, there is enough in the regularity and certainty of the compensation to make up for that. Besides that there is the additional feature which permits extra pay for every two miles up to a speed of thirty miles per hour, and every one mile up to forty miles per hour. This more than makes up the difference.

So I again say, Mr. Chairman, that the bill as reported was a fair one. I was unaware till an hour ago that the subcommittee had changed their views as to the relative rate of pay, and had fixed it at 4 mills instead of 5 mills per linear foot. In my judgment that is not sufficient.

I do not say anything about the clause as to the Pacific railroads, the land-grant roads. In my opinion they should be paid precisely what other roads are paid; and if they are indebted to the Government for assistance given in their construction, that does not at all release us of the obligation to treat them justly and fairly. They should be made to pay their debts to the Government, and they should be paid a fair compensation for services rendered to the Government, to be credited to their account.

I find, then, in this bill all the elements that are required in the postal service. First, the space occupied, and that space fixed by the weight carried. The next element is the frequency with which the service is performed. The next is the speed with which the mails are carried. In every branch of the service we have been accustomed to have frequency, and to-day there is no excuse for any bill that leaves out this element of compensation. If it is a benefit to transport the mails from one point to another in twelve hours and we have thought it expedient and proper to offer other inducements in larger pay for quicker mails, why should it not be embodied in one general law, that will induce the railroad companies of the United States to increase their speed and the frequency of their mail trains?

Why, sir, we have leaving New York every day four great trains that carry nothing but mail—neither passengers nor express nor baggage. Of course these companies must have extra inducements, because their trains have to leave at hours fixed by the postmaster at New York. In the British system the postmaster-general has the right to fix the schedule of departure and of arrival, the time of delay at the several stations, and the time for arriving at and leaving stations; but the postmaster-general fixes a compensation commensurate with this extra service, something that is just and reasonable, to compensate these roads for the facilities they extend to the government. In any system of service rendered by citizens of the United States to the Government they should be paid exactly for what they do. If a solitary company to-day receives insufficient pay from the United States for this service rendered in carrying its mail, this bill proposes to give them exactly what they earn and no more.

It is unjust to the Government that the sympathies of the House should be appealed to to pay more to a small road because it is small or poor, when it does not earn the money by the service it renders to the Government. There is but one standard that this House, in justice to itself and in justice to the railroads of the country, can adopt, and that is a uniform reasonable rate of compensation for all roads for the service rendered. When we go beyond that, we undertake to subsidize the small roads to put a life into them which they have not in themselves. On the other hand, we do not propose—to use the language of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR]—to rob the big roads of money to which they are entitled by reason of their services.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MONEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. TILLMAN. Why is it that the compensation on the small star routes is much greater in proportion to the weight of the mail carried than on the routes where there are heavier mails?

Mr. MONEY. I will answer that with pleasure. The star routes are open to the world, and every man in the country is at liberty to bid for that service, the Government taking the lowest bidder. The Government can not compel a man to carry the mails by his wagon, his horse, or his stage-coach, but the railroads are compelled to carry the mails—compelled not by law but by public opinion. A railroad that runs through a populous country, connecting great cities, bound together by domestic ties and by the thousand ties of business and politics, can not afford to decline to carry the mails, because if it does its competitors will take all the trade. So in dealing with the railroads the Government fixes the rate at which they shall be compensated; it does not invite competition between them, it simply fixes the rate that it will pay.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish to ask the gentleman another question. Can not a road running between large cities and carrying with many passengers large amounts of freight and making several round trips a day, afford to carry the mails for much less than a poor railroad can, running through a sparsely settled country and making but one trip a day? I ask the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] if in his judgment the compensation ought to be on the same basis for a poor road having but little freight or travel and making but one trip a day, and a large road between two great cities? Ought not the poor road to have more pay in proportion than the other?

Mr. MONEY. The gentleman's question is an argument against his own position, because this bill fixes a uniform standard rate of compensation based upon weight, frequency, and speed. If a railroad does a large business, its space is valuable in proportion, and therefore the Government ought to pay for it.

Mr. TILLMAN. But is not the element of frequency entirely eleminated on the poor road?

Mr. MONEY. If a road runs through a sparsely settled country, and does not do much business, it follows that its space is not very valuable.

Mr. HORR. That is not the point.

Mr. MONEY. Let me finish my answer to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. He says that frequency ought not to be considered in regulating the pay on a small road. Now, it costs just as much to run a car at one time in the day as at another, and if two trains are run, the space upon one of them is presumed to be just as valuable as upon the other.

Mr. HORR. But this is a point to be considered. A little road takes a small number of linear feet, from four and a half up to thirteen. It can not take over thirteen until it gets over five hundred pounds of mail. Can not a road afford to sell one hundred and eighty or three hundred and sixty feet of space every day at a cheaper rate per foot than it can afford to sell nine, ten, or up to thirteen feet? Yet you give them all precisely the same rate per foot, no matter how much or how little space they sell.

Mr. MONEY. When a road gets into that position which my friend from Michigan and my friend from South Carolina describe, it is protected by the provision that it shall not receive less than $35 a mile. Such a road as gentlemen describe is not worth more than $35 a mile to the Government or to anybody else, and whenever the value of its space increases there will be more frequent trips. But the cost of a certain amount of space is just as great upon one train as upon another; and if the Government demands a certain space upon any train, it ought to be willing to pay for it. In every other department of the service we pay for frequency and speed, and we do so properly. If we can save twelve hours between Chicago and New York, how valuable that is to the merchants of these great cities! Why, sir, a merchant in New Orleans has informed me that the value to the merchants of the fast mail between that city and New York would pay the whole cost of it, and a merchant of Denver states that a fast mail between New York and Denver, passing through the great cities of Chicago and Saint Louis, would save a thousand dollars a year to him alone. This mail service is for the benefit of all the people of the Union.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have a very compassionate feeling for the small roads, because the roads that run through my country are generally of that class. The greatest road that runs through my State carries only 4,000 pounds of mail per day. I allude to the southern section of the Illinois Central. It carries only 4,000 pounds a day, and that only once a day. It runs two passenger trains, but only one of them is a mail train. It does not carry more than one mail a day, because under the present system the Government does not give more for carrying two mails a day than for carrying one, unless you make the appropriation which is left out of this bill for special facilities on great trunk lines.

Now recollect that 90 per cent. of all the mails of the Union are distributed upon these trains; and whenever you expedite a solitary mail on any railroad of the United States you expedite by exactly that much every star-route fed by these great trunk lines. The mail system of the whole Union has its ramifications in every section and every community, and the service to every citizen is quickened by any expedition of the schedule on any of these roads. In every sense of the word, looking at the interest of the Government of the United States and the interest of every citizen enjoying the benefits of postal communication, this bill is a fair and just one, and a measurable improvement over the old system of weighing the mails, which is partial and one-sided to the last degree. Why, sir, as the matter stands to-day, the discrepancy in pay, comparing the small roads with the great ones, is as eight to ninety-six in relation to the service performed; in other words, one road is paid twelve times as much as the other roads for the service it renders.

It is not the province of Congress to say that because a railroad does a great business it should not have reasonable pay for its service, and when, in a bill of general character like this, we undertake to say that, subject to the discretion of the Postmaster-General, we will discriminate, fixing one price for one road and another price for another road, we at once open the door for a flood of corruption which would sweep through the whole mail service of the country.

Mr. REAGAN. Has the committee ascertained what the first-class roads—those carrying the heaviest mails—would receive under this system?

Mr. MONEY. I have seen no figures based upon this system, and I do not know of any. I have none myself.

Mr. HORR. What was the question?

Mr. MONEY. The gentleman from Texas asked whether I knew what the main trunk lines would receive under this new system. This matter was explained by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR]. I do not recollect his figures. But it matters not, Mr. Chairman, what may be the amount that these roads will receive in the aggregate. I am trying to impress upon the mind of this House the fact that under this system each road will receive exactly what it earns, and will not receive one dollar unless it does earn it. This House could expect nothing more, and could offer nothing less. We can afford to be just to our own citizens, whether corporations or private individuals, especially when we compel these corporations by force of public opinion to do this service for the Government, whether they wish to do it or not, and at a price which we ourselves fix.

Mr. REAGAN. Does not the gentleman think the House is entitled to information from the committee as to what the cost would be per mile on these great roads for carrying the mails under the system proposed?

Mr. HORR. I told you the cost.

Mr. MONEY. I said that the gentleman from Michigan had the figures. In this connection I will say that, according to the figures of experts who have thoroughly examined the question, this system will save over $1,678,000 per annum. That is the estimated saving to the Government on the present basis of pay and the present basis of business.

Of course this great business is constantly enlarging. It is estimated that for the current year the increase will be about 9 per cent. So the extension of business goes on, marking the development of our country, its population, its wealth, &c. There is no better index of the progress of this country than the extension of and perfection of our great postal system, as shown by the reports of this Department year after year.

As I have said, the basis of pay contemplated by this bill is a fair one. If a railroad chooses to make thirty miles an hour or more, it will get a proportionate increase of pay for every mile of additional speed. This is proper and just. It costs more to run a fast train than a slow one. The consumption of rolling-stock, road-bed, and track is greater. Everything points to additional expense, which is attempted to be met by the provisions of this bill.

There are some features embraced in the bill of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads which the Committee on Appropriations have not thought it expedient to incorporate in this bill. I will engage in no sort of dispute about that. I am willing to take this measure as it is. This bill, following in this respect the bill reported by the Post-Office Committee, leaves as it is the relative status of the land-grant roads and the other roads. Not that I think there is any justice in this discrimination, as I have said awhile ago; but we had no disposition to disturb the law as it stands, knowing the House to be inclined, as it has been previously, to make that distinction.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I come to another provision of the bill, if the House will bear with me, to which I propose to address myself. That is in regard to the reduction of newspaper postage. The postage on newspapers is really a tax on the publishers of these papers. They pay this much to the Government for permission to do their business. It is a relic of that class of taxes which has almost entirely faded away. All the other taxes in relation to postage are levied on the people of the United States. They are paid by the beneficiaries of the postal system. These are paid by the publishers. It is evident inequality and injustice was rendered necessary in some degree by the collection of postage on newspapers, as that was uncertain under the old system and very unsatisfactory. Therefore, to make the whole system of prepayment of postage uniform it was necessary to provide newspapers should also prepay, withdrawing the burden from the millions of readers to the shoulders of the publishers themselves.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HUNT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] who opened this discussion stated to the committee that some legislation was absolutely necessary to transport the mails of the United States to foreign ports. The bill before the House, at line 228, provides:

> For transporting the mails of the United States in American steamships between any port of the United States and any foreign port, or between ports of the Atlantic and ports of the Pacific touching at any foreign port, an amount not exceeding $600,000 of the net revenues of the Post-Office Department of the United States on mail-matter sent to foreign countries during the fiscal year next preceding the date of the contract for said service: Provided, That the contract for said service shall be entered into by the Postmaster-General only after legal advertisement with the lowest responsible bidder, for a term not exceeding four years, and at a rate not to exceed 50 cents per mile on the trip each way of actual nautical miles traveled between terminal ports for each trip actually made, which shall not be increased on account of expedition or increased number of trips: Provided further, That the general laws regulating the transportation of inland mails shall be applicable to such contracts, except as herein provided: And provided further, That vessels engaged in this service shall be of American registry, and shall, in time of war, be liable to charter or purchase by the United States at reasonable rates; and all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and this act shall take effect from and after July 1, 1885.

The remark of the gentleman from Illinois that some legislation is indispensably necessary becomes evidently true when we consider what was done at the last session of Congress. Congress then repealed sections 3976 and 4203 of the Revised Statutes of the United States requiring American vessels engaged in the foreign trade to carry the mails at a sum not exceeding the sea and inland postage. The repeal of these sections having taken place, it is apparent some additional legislation has become absolutely necessary.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman allow me just there to ask him a question?

Mr. HUNT. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is not the gentleman from Louisiana a member of the committee that had charge of the shipping bill?

Mr. HUNT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then I desire to know whether the object of repealing those sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States was not to prepare the way for this increase of compensation for carrying the mails?

Mr. HUNT. I will answer with pleasure.

Mr. BLOUNT. If that be true, I further inquire of the gentleman whether we can not re-enact in this bill the law as it stood prior to the repeal of those sections of the Revised Statutes?

Mr. HUNT. I will answer as I go on. Under the sections referred to American vessels engaged in foreign trade were compelled to carry the mails. These vessels might be detained for such limit of time as suited the Post-Office, and were obliged to deliver the mails to the foreign ports to which they were bound and to the Post-Office Department itself. For this service the Post-Office Department paid the inadequate sum of 2 cents a letter. Instances are stated to be numerous where American vessels have been detained by the Postmaster-General, to receive the mails and to deliver them, when the pay for carrying did not compensate the vessels for detention and cartage of letters at the port of destination.

The injustice so occasioned by the sections of the Revised Statutes referred to by the unanimous action of Congress was removed by the enactment of the shipping bill, providing for the repeal of these sections, to take effect from and after the 1st of April, 1885. The object of deferring the operation of the repeal of the sections was to enable Congress at its present session to legislate suitably in the premises, the Postmaster-General being without warrant of law (when his power of compulsion had been removed) to make contracts with American vessels engaged in the foreign trade for carriage of the United States mails except to the extent of the amount of sea and inland postage, which was fixed by the international postal treaties and made without regard to the extent of the service rendered and which was conceded on all sides to be inadequate.

Congress, then, Mr. Chairman, is brought to this condition, that there is now no power in the Postmaster-General to compel vessels to carry the mails as was formerly the case; and the only resource left him is to attempt to enter into contracts at rates which are likely to be declined as entirely inadequate, and which in the judgment of the Shipping Committee are contrary to sound public policy. In order that this may appear satisfactorily to the committee I have procured a statement from the Post-Office Department showing the sums paid for the ocean conveyance of mails between the United States and Mexico and South America during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, by the lines of vessels therein employed. The table is as follows:

If we turn from this view of the case of carrying the mails to Mexico and South America to the amounts paid for the whole foreign mail service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, the results are equally surprising and discreditable to the liberality of the Government and its sense of justice. The total sum so expended is $327,207.91. The table is as follows:

Amount paid for the whole foreign mail service during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1884.

If from this statement we turn, Mr. Chairman, to the coastwise and steamboat mail service of the country we find a contrast, and a striking contrast, which I desire to present as one of the strongest arguments in favor of the bill now before the committee. By steamboat from San Francisco, Cal., to Eureka, Cal., we paid $6,500 a year, or at the rate of 58 cents a mile; from Portland, Oreg., to the Dalles, $7,487, or 21 cents per mile. From Seattle to Sehome, Wash., we paid $8,439.83, at 32 cents per mile. From Port Townsend, Wash., to Sitka, in Alaska, we paid at the rate of $1.23 cents a mile, or $16,000 annually. From San Francisco, Cal., to Portland, Oreg., we paid $22,000, or 69 cents per mile. From New Tacoma, Wash., to Port Townsend, in Washington Territory, we paid $29,700, or 97 cents per mile, while during the same period we paid 3 cents a mile to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company and 3 cents to the Philadelphia and Queenstown line. What difference is there in the nature of things between the mail service of the country on the routes which I have now enumerated and the mail service of the country upon the ocean of which I have just spoken? Is it not performed under circumstances strikingly similar, except in regard of greater risk, greater adventure, and the concern of greater capital on the ocean routes?

Upon what system of correct reasoning, or upon what considerations of a wise and expansive public policy, can the Legislature insist upon the continuance of liberal rates such as I have spoken of in connection with steamboat routes, and refuse at the same time like compensation to steamships engaged in the transportation of the mails of the United States on the ocean?

Now, if we turn from the steamboat lines to the star-route service we find that also enumerated in the official tables. From Cedarville, Cal., to Reno, Nev., 20 cents a mile is paid, or $11,328 a year; from Bieber, Cal., to Lake View, Oreg., 27 cents a mile, or $11,500 annual pay, and so on the table goes, showing pay all the way from 20 cents per mile up to 45 cents. The table is as follows:

No. of route.	From—	To—	Pay per mile.	Miles.	Trips.	Annual pay.
46162	Cedarville, Cal.	Reno, Nev.	20+	177	Six times a week	$11,328 00
46155	Bieber, Cal.	Lake View, Oreg.	27+	115½	Seven times a week	11,500 00
37116	Green River City, Idaho	Fort Washakie, Wyo.	25+	153½	Seven times a week	13,000 00
42121	Boise City, Idaho	Winnemucca, Nev.	27+	267	Seven times a week	26,700 00
46153	Redding, Cal.	Grant's Pass, Oreg.	45+	200½	Seven times a week	34,572 03
41111	Kelton, Utah	Pendleton, Oreg	29+	544½	Seven times a week	57,665 97

Again, Mr. Chairman, if we turn to the exhibit of the Post-Office Department regarding the inland service of to-day we find that there are only ten States in the Union the mail service of which is self-sustaining.

According to the statement there is a net excess of expenditure up to date of over $3,000,000.

The table is as follows, and is accompanied by the annexed communication of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., January 5, 1885.

SIR: In compliance with the verbal request made by you, I herewith transmit a statement showing the postal receipts and expenditures in the respective States and Territories of the United States during the years 1882, 1883, and 1884. For a statement of the cost of service on six of the largest steamboat routes I would refer you to the statement furnished by this office, January 8, 1884, appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 1, 1884 (page 3651), there having been no material change in the cost of steamboat service since that date.

Very respectfully,

W. B. THOMPSON,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

HON. CARLETON HUNT,
House of Representatives.

If, then, we consider the condition of the country, now that it can no longer insist upon the carriage of the mails, as it were, for nothing; if we compare the carriage of the foreign-going mail with the sums paid for the steamboat and star-route service; if we look at the sums paid for the carriage of the mail to South America and Mexico; if we regard the amounts paid to the coastwise service; if we bear in mind that the liberality of the Department is extended, for example, to a line from Morgan City to Galveston, or in that neighborhood, at the rate of $38,000 a year; if we recall at the same time the nature of the ocean service, the difficulties therein involved, the enterprise concerned, and the capital of our citizens invested, there can be no justification whatsoever for witholding larger compensation.

The present view is made perfect, and I am brought near to a close in connection with it when I ask the consideration of the committee to what is proposed to be done by the bill. I hold in my hand a statement showing the net revenue of the Post-Office Department on mail matter sent to and received from foreign countries during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884. The total receipts are $2,157,622.63; the total expenditures are $1,431,893.77, and the net revenue, $725,728.86. This net revenue is reached necessarily after making all deductions, and especially a deduction upon the highest estimate of the cost of interior mail service.

The bill proposes of this net revenue to devote $600,000 in payment for the carriage of the mail. And it proposes to do so under all the restraints which are usual in other branches of the service.

The statement is as follows:

Statement showing, approximately, the net revenues of the Post-Office Department of the United States on mail matter sent to and received from foreign countries during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1884, based upon the tabulated estimate of mail matter exchanged during that period given on page 639 of the Postmaster-General's report for 1884.

(b) These expenses were not included in the similar statement made for 1883.

It is hardly necessary, Mr. Chairman, to say anything further in support of the view that I have laid before the Committee of the Whole. But I will conclude by calling your attention to the recent statistics published by the State Department to show how our commerce is affected by the prevailing penurious policy of the United States toward the ocean-going mail service. From a table just compiled in the State Department, it appears that the exports from England, France, and the United States to Mexico, Central and South America, the Spanish West Indies, Hayti, and San Domingo, of cotton goods, iron and steel, machines and implements of hardware and cutlery, &c., are as follows: From England, $112,183,000; from France, $77,213,000; and from the United States only $64,000,000.

It appears further, as to the trade of Brazil, while we import from that country products to the value of $53,000,000 against $29,000,000 imported therefrom into England and $29,000,000 into France, we export thither goods to the value of only $8,000,000, while England sends to Brazil goods valued at $34,000,000 and France goods valued at $15,000,000.

Of our total imports from South America the value of the goods brought in American vessels is $25,000,000, against a value of $49,000,000 brought in foreign vessels. It is only in our imports from the Spanish West Indies, Mexico, and Central America that American prevails over foreign tonnage, to wit: American vessels $53,000,000, against $22,000,000 in foreign vessels. Thus it appears that foreign vessels bring to the United States from those countries double the imports brought by American vessels. The imports into the United States from South America in foreign vessels are $49,000,000, in American vessels $25,000,000. The exports from the United States to South America in American vessels are $19,000,000, and in foreign vessels $11,000,000. Our total imports from South America in foreign steam vessels were of the value of $32,000,000, against $900,000 in American vessels.

This result, it appears, is brought about by the foreign policy in relation to commerce by steam sea-going vessels.

The round trips of the great European lines of steam vessels are expedited according to the following order: From Europe laden with European manufactures to South America; from South America laden with South American products to the United States; from the United States laden with our products to Europe; thus completing the circle to the advantage of European trade alone, only very few steam vessels carrying American products to South America.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I incorporate in my remarks a table showing the course of the foreign civilized countries in this regard:

Table of subventions accorded by various European states to international steam-navigation lines.

States.	Number of companies subventioned.	Average duration of concessions.	Amount of the subventions.			Average speed required.
			Per year.	Per league.	By other criteria.
		Years.	Francs.	Francs.		Miles.
Austria	1	10	*5,000,000	2.85 to 10		8 to 12
Hungary	1	10	375,000		For 150 voyages	8 to 12
England	10	1	15,430,145		According to the importance of the postal service	9 to 12
France	2	15 to 24	32,414,457	25.90 to 45.70		9 to 12
Spain	7	8 to 10	5,000,000		According to the postal service	11 to 12½
Belgium	2	15	1,000,000		Guarantee of an average return	10 to 11
Holland	4	10 to 15	1,762,500	5 to 9.75		9 to 11
Germany	4	10	332,500		According to postal service	9 to 10
Italy	2	12	8,639,576	†12 to 32		8 to 10

*Other advantages. †According to the line.

The table proves that Austria, Hungary, England, France, Spain, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Italy, are all engaged in a course of liberal encouragement to their merchant marine. So that the fact is that while all the countries of the world that are civilized are engaged in encouraging ocean steam navigation we alone have neglected our opportunity. A review of the debates upon this question in foreign countries will indeed establish that the ocean-going steam vessel is considered the herald of civilization.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HUNT. The gentleman will excuse me. I will yield presently. It is the herald of civilization; it is the bearer of correspondence between merchant and merchant; it is the vehicle by which contractual relations are introduced, and the means by which in the end those contractual relations are brought to rich results.

The policy pursued by Great Britain, with characteristic enterprise and by the use of her almost boundless wealth (in the way of the circle of voyages which I have described), has been followed by a success which has brought to all Americans who have reflected, and who would have the policy of America liberal and flourishing, the deepest regret for our own shortcomings in this respect. In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I will ask the Clerk to read to the House an extract from a message of Governor Cleveland, of New York, whose attention as an enlightened statesman had been brought to this very subject. He has formulated views which are similar to those that I have expressed upon the floor to-day, and his early accession to the first office in the Republic gives hope that the country is about to have in the Executive chair a Chief Magistrate who will insist upon principles that are enlightened and liberal.

The Clerk read as follows:

Fifty years ago a most distinguished foreigner, who visited this country and studied its condition and prospects, wrote:

"When I contemplate the ardor with which the Americans prosecute commerce, the advantages which aid them, and the success of their undertakings, I can not help believing that they will one day become the first maritime power of the globe. They are bound to rule the seas as the Romans were to conquer the world * * * The Americans themselves now transport to their own shores nine-tenths of the European produce which they consume, and they also bring three-fourths of the exports of the New World to the European consumers. The ships of the United States fill the docks of Havre and of Liverpool; while the number of English and French vessels which are to be seen in New York is comparatively small."

We turn to the actual result reached since these words were written with disappointment.

In 1840 American vessels carried 82$\frac{5}{10}$ per cent. of all our exports and imports; in 1850, 72$\frac{5}{10}$; in 1860, 66$\frac{5}{10}$; in 1870, 35$\frac{6}{10}$; in 1880, 17$\frac{6}{10}$; in 1882, 15$\frac{6}{10}$.

The citizen of New York, looking beyond his State and all her efforts in the interest of commerce and national growth, will naturally inquire concerning the causes of this decadence of American shipping.

While he sternly demands of his home government the exact limitation of taxation by the needs of the State, he will challenge the policy that accumulates millions of useless and unnecessary surplus in the national Treasury, which has been not less a tax because it was indirectly but surely added to the cost of the people's life.

Let us anticipate a time when care for the people's needs as they actually arise, and the application of remedies as wrongs appear, shall lead in the conduct of national affairs; and let us undertake the business of legislation with the full determination that these principles shall guide us in the performance of our duties as guardians of the interests of the State.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SPRINGER). The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of making a motion that the House take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock, and I state to the House that I am willing that just before 12 o'clock to-morrow the committee shall rise so that the House may get out of Saturday's session. My object in moving a recess is to save an hour for debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BLACKBURN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. LEAVE TO PRINT TESTIMONY.

On motion of Mr. LYMAN, the Committee on Military Affairs was given leave to have printed for the use of the committee the testimony taken by it on the subject of armor-penetrating breech-loading cannon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the House now take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

ELECTORAL COUNT.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would suggest to gentlemen that there is a matter which affects the convenience of members and the counting of the electoral vote on the day after to-morrow, in relation to which the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY] desires to offer a resolution and the Chair was about to recognize him for that purpose.

Mr. FINDLAY. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on Wednesday, February 11, the whole of the east gallery and such portion of the south gallery as lies east of the reporters gallery shall be reserved for the use of the families of Senators, Members of the House of Representatives, and Delegates, and their visitors. The Doorkeeper shall strictly enforce this order. The Speaker shall issue to each Senator and member of the House of Representatives two cards of admission, and only persons holding these cards shall be admitted.

Mr. FINDLAY. This resolution is drawn in strict accordance with the resolution adopted without dissent on the occasion of the last electoral count. I hope there will be no objection.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered adopted.

Mr. FINDLAY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 1013) for the erection of a public building at Troy, N. Y.;

A bill (H. R. 1339) increasing the appropriation for the erection of the public building at Pittsburgh, Pa.;

A bill (H. R. 5674) for the erection of a public building at the city of Tyler, in the State of Texas; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 327) providing for printing the eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late John H. Evins, late a Representative in the Forty-eighth Congress from the State of South Carolina.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested, namely:

A bill (S. 2441) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Peoria, in the State of Illinois," approved May 9, 1882;

A bill (S. 2542) to amend an act entitled "An act for the erection of a public building at Quincy, Ill.," approved May 9, 1882; and

A bill (S. 2617) to authorize the acquisition of certain parcels of real estate embraced in square No. 406 of the city of Washington for the enlargement of the Post-Office Department building and for the accommodation of the city post-office.

WIDOW OF MAJ. THOMAS T. THORNBURGH.

Mr. WOLFORD, by unanimous consent, referred back favorably from the Committee on Pensions the bill (H. R. 7655) granting an increase of pension to the widow of Maj. Thomas T. Thornburgh, late of the United States Army; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the House now take a recess till 11 o'clock to-morrow morning. I will state I shall be willing that just before 12 o'clock to-morrow the Committee of the Whole may rise and the House adjourn.

Mr. NEECE. I move to amend the motion for a recess by striking out "11" and inserting "10."

Mr. DUNHAM (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) I move that the House adjourn.

The motion of Mr. DUNHAM was not agreed to.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Is it the intention, if this recess be taken till 10 o'clock to-morrow, that the two hours before 12 shall be devoted to a continuation of the general debate, no other business to be done? [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is not informed of the purpose of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DUNHAM. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether he intends to run this legislative day through to-morrow?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not. I intend to move just before 12 o'clock to-morrow that the committee rise and the House adjourn.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. NEECE, there were—ayes 70, noes 46.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I make the point that no quorum has voted. I am opposed to doing business without a quorum.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. NEECE and Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 86, noes 51.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. No quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky insists on the point that no quorum has voted.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Pending that, I move the House do now adjourn. I am opposed to proceeding without a quorum. We met this morning at 10 o'clock, and not a dozen members were present.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Tuesday next at 12 o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule the House when it adjourns would meet at 12 o'clock on Tuesday.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Does not the record show that we are now proceeding in the legislative day of Saturday?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is correct; this is the legislative day of Saturday.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The House would meet on Tuesday at any rate, would it not?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair, the effect would be substantially the same, whether the motion of the gentleman from Missouri be agreed to or not.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, it was agreed to.

The question then recurring on the motion of Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, that the House adjourn, there were—ayes 45, noes 53.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I now renew my motion that the House take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow, Tuesday.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Does the gentleman from Illinois, speaking for his side, say that we shall adjourn to-morrow morning before 12 o'clock, so that the House may operate for an hour under the new rule?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Speaking for myself, and also I think for my side of the House, I do so state.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois for a recess.

Mr. NEECE. What became of my motion?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It failed for lack of a quorum.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I call for the previous question on my motion.

Mr. HISCOCK. I submit to the gentlemen from Illinois whether the form of his motion should not be for a recess until Tuesday morning at 11 o'clock.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That is the form in which I have stated it.

Mr. HISCOCK. I thought the gentlemen said "to-morrow morning."

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the motion of Mr. TOWNSHEND for a recess was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until to-morrow (Tuesday) morning at 11 o'clock.

AFTER RECESS.

The recess having expired, the House, at 11 o'clock a. m. (Tuesday, February 10), resumed its session, Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8138) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the order of the House all general debate will expire in one hour and five minutes, of which time the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] is entitled to thirty minutes, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is entitled to thirty-five minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe the gentleman from Pennsylvania was entitled to the floor last evening. If general debate is to be closed in one hour and five minutes, I hope there will be some understanding as to how the time is to be consumed on each side.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has stated that under the order of the House the time for general debate will be exhausted in one hour and five minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. This side of the House is entitled to thirty-five and the other side to thirty minutes.

Mr. BINGHAM. This side of the House, in my judgment, is entitled to one hour. There has been consumed on this side but one hour and a half.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If that is so, that side of the House is entitled to an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. There was no order made in regard to the division of the time between the two sides of the House.

Mr. BINGHAM. By no agreement, but by an understanding to which there was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has been unable to determine by the line of argument taken whether gentlemen were for or against the bill. Some were in favor of some particular parts and opposed to others; and some suggested propositions of future amendment. Therefore there can not be said to be sides, so far as has been developed in the general debate which has already taken place.

Mr. DINGLEY. The general debate was limited to five hours, and it was understood that two hours and a half would be used by this side of the House and two and a half by the other side of the House. Now, this side of the House has only had an hour and a half.

Mr. BINGHAM. And that time on the part of this side of the House has been used by the two members of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR].

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there will be any objection to allowing the other side of the House the time desired.

The CHAIRMAN. But the general debate has been limited by order of the House.

Mr. KING. The extension asked for can be granted by unanimous consent.

Mr. BINGHAM. I think the Chair is in error as to the time that has been consumed.

Mr. KING. I ask unanimous consent to extend the time.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I suggest that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] proceed, and in the mean time we can arrange this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has stated there was an hour and five minutes left of time for general debate on this bill. The Chair has not undertaken to allot the time between the two sides of the House, but has followed the usual course of taking the names handed to him.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the Chair will refer to the RECORD it will be found that the debate did not commence until 2 o'clock, and the House adjourned at five minutes after 5.

The CHAIRMAN. The general debate commenced at five minutes after 1 o'clock. The Chair is positive about that, as he noted it himself at the time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserved thirty-five minutes of my hour and am willing to yield a portion of that time to the other side, but I wish twenty-five minutes myself.

Mr. DINGLEY. How long did the gentleman from Kansas occupy?

The CHAIRMAN. Half an hour, and he yielded thirty minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], which would make, when occupied, two hours and twenty minutes for that side of the House.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] took an hour in his own time, when Mr. RYAN then obtained the floor and yielded to him twenty minutes.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is the position exactly.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Yes; that is the fact.

Mr. YORK. What time remains of the five hours for general debate?

The CHAIRMAN. One hour and five minutes.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Chair announced when Mr. RYAN left the floor he had thirty minutes of his time left, which he yielded to me, so the RECORD states.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated that the gentleman from Kansas had thirty minutes left, which he yielded to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM]. Now, the order of the House must be obeyed so far as the time for closing general debate is concerned, and of that time only one hour and five minutes remain.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. How much on either side?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is unable to decide whether gentlemen who occupied the floor were for or against the bill, but has recognized them in the order in which their names were given to him.

Mr. KING. What is the wish of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BINGHAM. So far as I am personally concerned I have ample time; but my friend from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] desires an opportunity to discuss one of the paragraphs of the bill, for which purpose he will require at least half an hour.

Mr. KING. I hope that time will be granted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will proceed for thirty minutes, after which time gentlemen can determine how the other thirty-five minutes will be divided.

Mr. BINGHAM addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to correct a statement which he made before the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] began as to the time remaining for general debate. The Chair was then informed by the Clerk that but one hour and five minutes remained. The Chair has since examined the record of the time occupied yesterday by each gentleman, and finds that up to this time gentlemen on the minority side of the House have occupied two hours, and gentlemen on the other side two hours and thirteen minutes, leaving forty-seven minutes, of which the Chair will award thirty minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY].

Mr. TOWNSHEND. How much will be left for our side of the House?

The CHAIRMAN. Seventeen minutes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I had reserved twelve minutes from the hour allotted to me. I wish to say I will yield my time to my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] if he desires it.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Louisiana yesterday called the attention of the Committee of the Whole to the importance of early action by Congress on the subject of the foreign mail service of the United States. I desire to emphasize the conclusions of that gentleman, and to add such considerations as my time will permit. The twenty-third section of the shipping act, approved June 26, 1884, repealed all laws and parts of laws that compel vessels of the United States to carry our mails to and from foreign countries for the small compensation allowed by law, the repeal to take effect on the 1st of April next. This repeal was just and proper, for there was obvious injustice in requiring the owners of American vessels in the foreign trade to carry our mails arbitrarily for a grossly inadequate compensation, while not only the owners of foreign vessels entering and clearing from our ports, but also the owners of American coastwise vessels and land conveyances, were left free to make such arrangements with the Government for transporting the United States mails as were mutually satisfactory.

So far as mail communication between the United States and the countries of Europe are concerned, the repeal of these compulsory provisions of our laws can cause no difficulty. The immense carrying trade between this country and Europe and the necessity imposed on the nations of Europe of maintaining frequent and rapid postal and commercial communication with the United States have built up a large number of lines of steamships. These lines, to be sure, are all foreign since the withdrawal of the Philadelphia American line a few months ago; yet all are willing to make contracts to carry our mails for the postal-union rate, for the reason that the immense amount of mail matter carried between this country and Europe makes this rate yield a considerable compensation, and for the further reason that as these lines of steamers are maintained by other business and by the mail subsidies of the nations of Europe, whatever additional pay can be obtained of our Government is so much gain.

But so far as direct mail connection with the countries of Central and South America, Mexico, the Sandwich Islands, the Australian colonies, China, Japan, and some of the West India islands, is concerned, the repeal of the compulsory provisions of our law, unless some provision shall be made for adequate compensation, is in danger of depriving our people of the facilities of postal communication now offered by the lines of American steamers which make regular trips between the United States and these countries. I do not by any means desire to intimate that the owners of these American steamship lines will take any improper advantage of the fact that after the 1st of April next they will have the same right to control their own property that every other citizen of this country possesses. But no reasonable man will expect them, for any considerable time after that date, to continue to carry the mails of the United States many thousand miles for so paltry a compensation that the amount received from our Government for this service by one of our largest steamship companies has barely paid for the expense to which the company has been subjected in delivering the mails at the post-offices at the termini of the routes.

Indeed, there has been so marked a discrimination against American vessels in the foreign trade in our postal legislation and administration that a simple statement of its nature is a convincing argument against its continuance. Under the compulsory law requiring the master of an American vessel in the foreign trade to receive, convey, and deliver all mails tendered him by the Post-Office Department, for which he shall be entitled to receive 2 cents per letter, our Government in a recent year paid five important American steamship lines, which traveled 1,181,309 miles, and maintained regular postal and commercial communication with Australia, China, Japan, Brazil, Cuba, and Mexico, $31,405 for carrying the mails of the United States, or the munificent compensation of 2¾ cents per mile!

In the same year, under the laws applicable to coastwise vessels and inland conveyances, that give contracts for carrying the mails to the lowest voluntary bidder for such transportation, the Government paid five small lines of coastwise steamers, which traveled only 247,960 miles and connected several minor domestic ports, the sum of $142,706, or 57½ cents per mile.

As an illustration of the discrimination against American vessels in the foreign trade, I ask the committee to observe that while the small coastwise steamers which carry the United States mail between Galveston and Brashear, received $50,000 per annum for this service, a distance of a few hundred miles, the Pacific Mail Steamship Company received only $14,849 for conveying the United States mails between San Francisco and Australia, China and Japan, a distance of 12,000 miles.

I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that no fair-minded man will care to have this unjust discrimination continued. I desire to bring this state of things to the attention of Congress, in order that there may be legislation before the adjournment authorizing the Postmaster-General to give such compensation for carrying our mails to the countries of this continent and the countries of the East which lie nearer to us than to Europe as will not only maintain the present postal and commercial communication afforded by American lines, but will also encourage the establishment of new lines directly connecting the United States with other countries of South America with which we have no steam communication except by way of England. The President, in his annual message, and the Postmaster-General, in his recent report, both call the attention of Congress to the necessity of legislation on that point.

Mr. Chairman, to my mind the provisions incorporated into the postal appropriation bill by the Appropriations Committee, if enacted into law, will tend to accomplish this result; and accomplish it, too, simply by the extension to foreign mail service by American steamers of the same system of contract to the lowest bidder which has worked so successfully on the land in the case of inland conveyances, and so acceptably on ocean routes where the mail is conveyed by coastwise steamers between our own ports.

The provision recommended by the Committee on Appropriations, and in substance unanimously indorsed by the Select Committee on Shipping Interests, although the latter recommend a larger appropriation, simply authorizes the Postmaster-General to invite proposals for carrying the mails in American steamers between the United States and foreign ports to which he may regard it desirable to extend postal and commercial communication, and, if he shall deem it proper, to enter into contract for not exceeding four years, with the lowest responsible bidder, for a sum not to exceed 50 cents per nautical mile traveled each way, the entire amount to be expended for this purpose not to exceed the profit which the Government makes on its foreign mail service, and not more than $600,000 for the next fiscal year. It will be observed that not a dollar of the revenue obtained by ordinary taxation is to be appropriated to maintain and extend postal and commercial communication with foreign countries. The rule which has always prevailed in our domestic postal service has been to make expenditure and revenue as nearly equal as possible. The plan of the committee extends the same principle to our foreign mail service, and proposes to use the excess of receipts from this source above expenditure, deducting even the cost of inland service, in improving and extending postal and commercial communication with foreign countries. Even if we should appropriate the gross revenue of the foreign mail service, estimated at $1,700,000, in maintaining and extending postal and commercial communication with foreign countries by means of American steamers, as recommended by the Shipping Committee, we should fall far short of what England does in the same direction, for in the last fiscal year she paid British steamship lines over a million and a half of dollars more than the gross amount received for foreign postage, and but a few years ago her expenditure for this object in excess of receipts exceeded three millions annually.

From the last annual report of the British postmaster-general received at our Post-Office Department I take the following statement of the amounts paid by Great Britain to steamship lines, almost entirely British, for foreign mail service, and the amounts paid each line by the Government in excess of the receipts for postage:

Steamship lines.	Payments.	Excess of payments over postal receipts.
Australia	(*)
Brazil	$60,825

West coast of Africa	41,990	10,000

United States	462,615	260,000
Bermuda and Jamaica	87,500	82,500

*Paid by Australia. †Paid by colony.

Previous to 1875 the British Government paid annually from $4,000,000 to $5,000,000 to steamships for ocean mail service; an amount from two to three millions in excess of her revenue from foreign postage. Nearly all of this sum was paid British steamship lines. France pays her mail steamships over four and a half millions annually; Italy nearly two millions, Austria one million, Spain one million, and even little Holland over $300,000.

Compare with these figures the sums paid to steamships by the United States for foreign mail service in the last fiscal year, as follows:

Service.	American.	Foreign.	Total.
Transatlantic	$2,833 20	$268,116 34	$270,949 44
Trans-Pacific	16,833 97	2,241 81	19,125 78
South and Central America and West Indies, &c.	30,259 33	6,873 36	37,132 69
	49,976 50	277,231 41	327,207 91

The aggregate amount paid to steamships for foreign mail service in 1884 by the United States was $327,207, of which only $49,976 was paid to American steamers, while Great Britain paid for the same object an aggregate of $3,039,830, of which about $2,900,000 went to British steamships. Until within a year and a half the little colonies of Australia and New Zealand and New South Wales paid the Pacific Mail Steamship Company $400,000 annually to maintain postal and commercial communication with the United States, and since November, 1883, the amount paid has been $250,000, of which New Zealand has contributed $156,000 and New South Wales $94,000, while the United States paid for the same service only $11,000. Finding that the United States was disinclined to pay its proportion of the cost of maintaining this service New South Wales withdrew last December, and unless this country comes to the aid New Zealand will soon follow, and steamship communication with Australia will be discontinued.

Observe the great difference in compensation awarded for carrying the mails by Great Britain to her steamers and that paid by the United States to our steamers for similar service. Great Britain paid her Brazil line $60,825; the United States paid our Brazil line $5,249. Great Britain paid her lines to the West Indies and Mexico $420,115; the United States paid our Cuban and Mexican lines $9,800; Great Britain paid her China and East India lines $1,793,000; the United States paid our China, Japan, and Australian line $14,849.

The simple statement of these facts, when it is borne in mind that with two or three exceptions the figures of the past year illustrate the indifference of our Government for nearly thirty years to the extension of postal and commercial communication with foreign countries by means of American steamship lines, goes far to explain our humiliating position on the ocean and ought to arouse the attention of Congress to the importance of preliminary legislation looking to the adoption of that policy of encouraging the establishment of steamship lines by liberal mail pay which was so successfully inaugurated by Great Britain more than forty years ago, and which nearly every European commercial nation has within a recent period begun to imitate.

I am aware, Mr. Chairman, it is sometimes claimed that Great Britain has been indifferent to the national character of the vessels which carried her mails, and that her sole object has been to secure the transmission of postal matter with celerity, regularity, and at the lowest cost, regardless of the flag which floated over it and the nationality of the ports from which the steamers took their departure. No one can trace the history of the development of England's postal and commercial communications without reaching the conclusion that the two have marched abreast.

Wherever there seemed to be an opening for British trade she has hastened to encourage the establishment of steamship communication by tendering liberal pay for carrying her mails. She has not been content to send her mails by any foreign steamship line when it has been possible to secure equal dispatch by a British line. When the Collins line of American steamers seemed about to distance the British Cunard line, England did not say that it made no difference to her whether her mails were carried by British or American steamers, but she promptly came forward to the aid of the Cunard line by increasing her mail pay. She could have dispatched her mails to Brazil by the French line of steamers at a nominal cost, but instead of doing this she came forward to aid in the maintenance of a direct British line, not simply by liberal mail pay, but by a guarantee of 8 per cent. interest to encourage merchants to maintain a British line to Brazil. She continued this policy until the British steamship lines had possession of the routes of foreign trade and there was no necessity of more than ordinary compensation.

The policy of Great Britain has been to maintain direct postal and commercial communication by means of British steamships with all foreign countries which offered opportunities for trade. As strikingly stated by Capt. Bedford Pim, a well-known English statesman, in a recent address in Washington, the British hold that "trade will follow the flag." Trade follows the flag which opens and maintains direct postal and commercial communication. It is in part by means of British steamship lines connecting directly and regularly foreign countries with the ports of Great Britain, and affording prompt and regular means of correspondence and transportation of merchandise, that Great Britain has been able to seize and hold to such an extent the markets of the world.

One of the important problems which is commanding the attention of the American people at the present time is how to obtain possession of a large share of the trade of the non-manufacturing countries of this continent, which purchase of us only sixty-four millions, but of France seventy-seven millions, and of Great Britain one hundred and twelve millions. The present Congress has regarded a successful solution of this problem so important that it has authorized a commission to visit Mexico and the countries of Central and South America and report such measures as seem to these gentlemen best calculated to secure this end. The commission have not yet completed their labors, but they have already obtained sufficient light to make public some of their conclusions. They represent in the strongest terms possible that one of the first things to be done is to establish direct and regular steamship connection for postal and commercial purposes with such countries in South America as we wish to reach with the products of our industries.

At present we have no regular direct steamship connection with most of the countries of South America. Our mails and our goods must largely go by the roundabout way of England. In these days when purchasers demand conveniences for swift communication and quick delivery it is impossible for us to think of largely reaching the markets of South America unless we have steamship lines regularly running between our ports and the leading ports of that country by which mails and goods may be transported promptly and regularly.

The growth of our trade with Australia, Mexico, and other countries with which we have established regular steamship connection affords evidence of the commercial importance of regular American steamship lines. Our exports to Mexico have increased from $3,716,599 in 1866 to $14,370,992 in 1883; to Central America, from $121,534 to nearly two millions; and to Australia, from $3,419,973 in 1870 to $9,638,997 in 1883.

It is idle, however, to expect that the existing American steamship lines to Australia, China, Japan, and Brazil can be long sustained, or new lines to South American ports be established, unless the United States shall feel sufficiently interested to extend liberal mail pay for postal service. No nation of Europe has ever originally established steamship lines to connect with foreign countries without liberal mail pay from the government. It has been frequently asserted that this has not been the case with Great Britain. The official records, however, prove that England was the pioneer of this policy on the most liberal scale. To settle this point beyond question, however, I addressed a note of inquiry to Capt. Bedford Pim, recognized everywhere as an English authority on all matters relating to the British marine, and I received from him a prompt reply on this point, in which he says:

> It has been the policy of the British Government to establish or rather encourage the establishment of British steamship lines by the annual payment of a postal subsidy, and this with the most gratifying result as regards the expansion of British commerce. I know of no instance of a British postal line of steamers originally established without a subsidy for carrying the mails.

Now that Great Britain has obtained possession of most of the important lines of steamship communication with foreign countries she has no need of dispensing her largesses with so liberal a hand as formerly; but the mail compensation she still gives so many of her steamship lines shows that she continues to jealously guard this important agency in the development of her foreign trade.

Mr. Chairman, there remains one other consideration which it is important that Congress should not overlook. The plan to which I am calling attention provides that in case of war all American steamers, under contract to carry the mails of the United States, shall be subject to purchase or charter by this Government at reasonable rates. This is substantially the condition on which Great Britain has for years entered into contract with her mail steamships. In this way she has constantly had at hand a large fleet of swift steamships at comparatively slight expense to her treasury, which she could take possession of at a day's notice in case of war, and use as transports for troops and supplies, and even as light-armed swift cruisers to sweep an enemy's commerce from the sea.

By encouraging the establishment and maintenance of steamship lines employing large and swift vessels, through liberal compensation for carrying our mails to foreign countries, it is in our power, at a comparatively small expense, to build up a fleet of steamships and large private ship-yards, which will be of inestimable value in case of war.

The chief objections to the plan proposed by the committee, which have been suggested, are that it gives the Postmaster-General too much power; that it involves too great expense; that it will inure largely to the benefit of the few existing American lines which will have no competition, and that it will not measurably add new lines running to other countries.

These objections are entitled to careful consideration. If no new lines of American steamships shall be added to our present fleet, no expense would be incurred in that direction. If new lines to some of the more important ports of South America can be secured even at the maximum compensation provided, I think there would be little difference of opinion as to the wisdom of the appropriation.

The United States paid to foreign steamers in the last fiscal year about $268,000 for carrying her mails to Europe, and will pay nearly $300,000 in the next year. I am informed by gentlemen who have practical acquaintance with the subject that if this sum was annually placed at the disposal of the Postmaster-General, with authority to make a contract for four years for carrying our European mails, American capitalists would without doubt enter into a contract with our Government to establish a semi-weekly line or lines of American mail steamships, equal to any in the world, between New York and Liverpool, on the assurance that they would receive the same sum annually for carrying our mails to Europe that is now paid in the aggregate to foreign steamers. And this sum, it is worthy of note, is almost exactly the maximum of 50 cents per nautical mile, estimating the mileage made by a semi-weekly line of steamships between New York and Liverpool. Would it not be far wiser to use the $268,000, or the $300,000, as the amount paid to foreign transatlantic steamers will unquestionably be the next fiscal year, in establishing an American line of swift first-class mail-steamers, that would bear the American flag and be available for Government uses in case of war, than to pay it to maintain foreign steamships, which would be turned against us in case of trouble between the United States and the nations under whose flag these steamers sail?

Such a change in our policy would add very little to our expenditure, so far as our transatlantic mails are concerned, on the basis of semi-weekly mails between Europe and the United States. Certainly, we could well afford to increase our expenditure for foreign mail service $550,000 annually, as contemplated by the provision recommended by the Committee on Appropriations, or even $1,700,000, as recommended by the shipping committee, if thereby we could secure and maintain prompt and frequent postal and commercial communication by American steamships with the countries of South America, the Australian colonies, and China and Japan—countries whose trade we are seeking to draw to ourselves in larger measure.

Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, the objection which has most weight is that under the plan proposed existing American steamship lines, running to the West India islands, Mexico, Central America, a few countries of South America, the Australian colonies, and China and Japan, might all be able to secure the maximum amount provided, without regard to the value of their service, and thus appropriate to themselves the most of the sum placed at the disposal of the Postmaster-General without adding anything to the facilities we now have. This objection assumes that the Postmaster-General would administer this measure, if it should be enacted into law, without due regard to the public interests. Why should there be fear of this in his administration of the laws relating to foreign mail service, with a limitation of the maximum expenditure by-law, when we have no hesitation in intrusting to him the expenditure of many millions in the domestic mail service by land and sea without any limit to the sum that he may pay for transportation of the mails? Why this extraordinary distrust the moment that any measures are proposed to promote postal and commercial facilities with foreign countries and encourage the American merchant marine?

It is to be observed that there is nothing in the measure proposed which requires the Postmaster-General to pay a single dollar to an American line of steamers. He may invite proposals for carrying the mails by American steamers to any country that he regards it proper to do so, and when he has received bids for this service he may reject any and all proposals which in his judgment it is not for the public interest to accept. If he can not obtain a proposal satisfactory to him he may send our mails by foreign competing steamers or by way of England. The absolute discretion vested in him in the foreign, as in the domestic mail service, limited, however, in the case of the foreign service to the maximum sum of 50 cents per mile and the aggregate of $600,000, would make the Postmaster-General master of the situation in the case of the adoption of the measure proposed.

Moreover, with the exception of the lines from the Sandwich Islands to Australia, San Francisco to Panama, and San Francisco to British Columbia, there is already competition by foreign steamship lines, which would be ready to carry our mails if American lines asked too much, or by American companies owning foreign steamers which would be ready to dispose of their foreign steamers and purchase American vessels in order to secure the contract for our mail service.

The following list of ocean mail-routes on which American vessels now carry the mails of the United States to foreign countries, with the number of miles traveled by steamships on each route and the amount paid each line by this Government for mail service in the last fiscal year, omitting the Philadelphia line now withdrawn, will be of interest in this connection:

List of ocean mail routes—Continued.

Lines of service.	Miles traveled.	Amount mail pay.
*Pacific Mail Steamship Company, San Francisco to Australia, &c	156,000	$11,184
Pacific Mail Steamship Company, San Francisco to China and Japan	165,620	3,665
Pacific Mail Steamship Company, New York to Aspinwall	144,072	6,841
*Pacific Mail Steamship Company, San Francisco to Panama	158,688	1,597
*San Francisco to British Columbia	83,000	387
New York, Havana and Mexican Mail Line, New York to Cuba, Porto Rico, and Mexico	200,000	8,101
New Orleans to Vera Cruz	16,000	873
New York and Brazil Line	162,060	5,249
New York and Cuba Mail Line, Cuba, Porto Rico, and Bahamas	101,500	$2,957
Morgan Line, New Orleans to Cuba and Mexico, Key West to Cuba, Galveston to Mexico	85,000	954
New Orleans to Honduras and Guatemala	61,200	512
New York to Hayti	35,496	483
New York to Venezuela	79,716	1,046
Baltimore to Bermuda	4,200	14
Boston, Halifax and Prince Edward	81,600	144
Boston to Yarmouth, Nova Scotia	75,600	141
San Francisco to Mexico	39,840	278
Oceanic Steamship Company, San Francisco to Hawaii	83,200	1,852
Steamship Mendoza, New York to Argentine Republic	26,000	87

The above lines, with a few irregular trips by other steamers carrying the mail, apparently make an aggregate mileage of about 1,750,000 miles. But the service from San Francisco to Hawaii, New York to the West India islands and Mexico, and several other points, is duplicated; several lines run to countries with which we are connected by raliroads; and on all the routes but the three indicated by a star, thus (*), there are competing lines. On one of these three, that from San Francisco to the Australian colonies, there is competition to Hawaii, which leaves routes covering only about 300,000 miles on which there is but one steamship line. Although the miles traveled by the steamers of the four lines of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, which carried the United States mails in the last fiscal year, were 624,380, yet there are competing lines, either foreign or American, over all portions of their routes except 231,488 miles; and mail matter may be dispatched even to these points by longer indirect foreign routes.

It will be seen, therefore, that there is no more reason to suppose that any sum which may be appropriated on the plan proposed for foreign mail service will not be wisely and economically expended by the Postmaster-General than there is that the much larger appropriations for domestic mail service puts in the hands of that officer will be misappropriated.

Mr. Chairman, I have dwelt on the objections urged against any practicable plan of increasing our postal and commercial communication with foreign countries and of encouraging the establishment of American steamship lines because many gentlemen have given undue importance to them. I am sure that when gentlemen rise to the national importance of these ends they must feel that Congress will do itself and the country great injury if it allows objections which can have no force except on the supposition that the Postmaster-General of the administration soon to be inaugurated will be unfit for the position, to stand in the way of an earnest effort to secure postal and commercial communication with foreign countries by means of American steamships.

A nation of 56,000,000 of people, occupying so high a place among the powers of Christendom, and proudly boasting of a future of which no other country ever dreamed, ought not to be content until her mails are carried to other nations by steamships floating her own flag. Our commercial interests demand this, for in the multiplied presence of American vessels in the world's waters there would come to us a commercial as well as moral advantage. The steamship is the great agency of foreign trade; and the commercial history of the world shows that trade follows the flag which floats at the masthead of the ocean carrier. What the devices of advertising are to the merchant who solicits trade our merchant fleets upon the seas are to this country.

Patriotism unites in the appeal for the extension of American steamship lines. A nation is known and felt abroad more by the flag floating over her shipping in foreign ports and on the great ocean highways than by any other agencies. If we would have our Republic more highly honored and respected abroad, we can secure this result in no other way so successfully and cheaply as by multiplying American ocean tonnage and encouraging the establishment of American steamship lines to the leading ports of the world. The same policy of liberal mail pay which has built up British steamship lines on all the great routes of ocean commerce, and nothing else, will, if persistently followed, secure to the United States similar results.

The instinct of self-preservation admonishes us to multiply swift merchant steamships, which in time of war may be laid hold of by our Government as transports and commerce-destroyers, and ship-yards which in time of need may be resorted to for the prompt construction of war vessels and engines of war. The nation whose boundaries and chief commercial cities are touched by the sea is almost defenseless unless it can cope with its enemies on the ocean. In modern times the seat of power of every nation is on the rocking waves as well as on the solid land.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman from Maine yields to me for the purpose of moving the committee rise.

Mr. DINGLEY. How much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. Thirteen minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BLACKBURN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8138) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. TOWNSHEND moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly (at 11 o'clock and 55 minutes a. m., February 10, 1885) adjourned.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1013) for the erection of a public building at Troy, N. Y., reported it without amendment.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 1339) to increase the appropriation for the erection of the public building at Pittsburgh, Pa. It proposes to increase the amount heretofore fixed as the limit of cost for the erection of a public building by the United States Government at Pittsburgh, Pa., to $1,500,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WASHINGTON CITY POST-OFFICE.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent to take up Senate bill 2617, providing for the Washington city post-office. The notice given by the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds [Mr. MAHONE] that he would call it up to-morrow, was made in consequence of the report not having been laid upon the desks of Senators at that time; but it is so important that the bill should pass the Senate and reach the other House, that I venture to ask that it be considered this morning. I think any Senator on reading the report will not hesitate to vote for the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent that the bill (S. 2617) to authorize the acquisition of certain parcels of real estate embraced in square No. 406 of the city of Washington, for the enlargement of the Post-Office Department building and to provide accommodations for the city post-office, be now taken from the Calendar for present consideration. By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. In lines 8 and 9 of section 8 I move to fill the blank by inserting the words "ten thousand;" so as to read:

He also introduced a bill (S. 2625) to make appropriation for continuance of improvements in Charleston Harbor; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 120) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan arms to the Richland Volunteer Company, of Columbia, S. C.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENT TO APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MAXEY, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the Post-Office appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

INTERNATIONAL LONGITUDE CONFERENCE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. "Concurrent or other resolutions" are now in order. The Chair lays before the Senate a concurrent resolution offered on a former day by the Senator from California [Mr. MILLER], authorizing the President to communicate to the governments of other nations the resolutions adopted by the international conference for fixing a prime meridian. However, the resolution was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, the Chair observes. It belongs on the Calendar.

Mr. SHERMAN. It had better be considered now.

Mr. MILLER, of California. If there is no objection I should like to have the resolution considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution was reported on a former day, and it was laid on the desk of the Chair as a resolution offered to which objection had been made. Resolutions reported from committees go on the Calendar. The Senator from California asks unanimous consent that the resolution, the title of which the Chair has read, be now considered. Is there objection?

Mr. CONGER. Let the resolution be read subject to objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be authorized and requested to communicate to the governments of all nations in diplomatic relations with the United States the resolutions adopted by the international conference held at Washington, in October-1884, for the purpose of fixing a prime meridian and a universal day, and to invite their accession to the same.

PROPOSED CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask that the Committee on Finance be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 2615) to authorize medals commemorating the completion and dedication of the Washington Monument, which was erroneously referred to that committee, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not care to which committee the bill is referred, but the Committee on Finance have always dealt with questions relating to coinage at the Mint, &c. I think the reference to the Committee on Finance was proper.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Finance be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Library. Is there objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. I can not see why a bill of that kind should go to the Committee on the Library.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. I object to the proposed change of reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

AMERICAN SHIPPING TRADE.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I ask that the resolution which I offered on the 4th of December relative to the American shipping trade be taken from the table and read, and I wish to submit some remarks on it.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution; which was read, as follows:

Whereas the shipping trade in American vessels is, and has for years been, depressed, and the export trade in American produce is languishing for want of a market that might be reached if the shipping trade was in the hands of citizens of the United States: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and is hereby, directed to inquire whether it would be expedient to expend the surplus revenue of the United States, or any portion thereof, for the purpose of reviving the shipping and export trade by allowing a rebate from tariff duties on foreign goods imported in ships built and owned in the United States, and by also allowing a premium on American-grown products and articles of American manufacture exported in American vessels, and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, the most important question before the country to-day is the depressed condition of business, and my object in introducing this resolution is to direct attention to the means by which I firmly believe that business can be revived. I do not claim to have a plan perfected in all its details, and I do not think that any one man can devise such a plan. But I think that I see the direction through which relief can and must come, and by agitation and discussion and mutual consultation I hope that from the general ideas which I shall suggest a practicable working plan may be elaborated, by means of which the country may resume its march of prosperity.

My belief is that relief can be obtained only by applying and extending the principle of the protective tariff in such manner as to secure foreign markets for our agricultural and manufactured products, and the best method of doing this is on the principle adopted in a recent French law, of which I shall present a full translation, namely, to pay a bounty both for the building and the running of American vessels—so much a ton for their construction and so much a mile for every ton transported. If our ship-building and ship-carrying interests are protected and fostered in this manner they can underbid the ships of Great Britain and other countries in the carrying trade, and we can find markets in every quarter of the globe for the supplies we are capable of producing over and above the needs of the home market.

In brief, then, I propose that we use ten, twenty, or, if necessary, thirty millions of our surplus revenue every year to protect the carrying trade, and thereby find markets for two hundred to three hundred millions of our surplus products.

I believe this method to be much simpler and more feasible than the system of rebates which I had in view at the time I introduced this resolution. Since that time I have conversed with those who are familiar with the details of the question. I have also consulted some of the most prominent statisticians in the country, and have used very freely the facts and figures obtained from them.

With these preliminary remarks, I will endeavor to explain as briefly as possible why I think the present an opportune time to call the attention of the country to the necessity of a practical measure looking to the restoration of the American carrying trade, and why, under the existing condition of affairs, such an agitation is likely to be prolific of good results.

In these times of business depression, when troubles are falling thick and fast upon our manufacturers; when the grain of the country is being stored in granaries because it will not pay to transport it to a distant market; when there are various estimates that from 500,000 to 1,000,000 of our working population are out of work; when capital lies idle for the want of useful employment, and when the cry comes from labor organizations throughout the land that work must be found for the unemployed, it is about time we turned our attention to measures of relief. In the midst of this suffering for the want of employment there is on all sides a great plenty. The granaries of the country are, as I have said, overflowing with the product of our fields. The mills and factories of the country are closing down for lack of orders. For the time being production seems to have overtaken consumption. We can raise in one year more grain and cotton and meat than we can consume in two years, and it has been said that we can manufacture in six months more than we can sell in a year. Stored away in our warehouses are millions of dollars' worth of goods for which we can find no purchasers. The national Treasury of the country partakes of the same plethoric condition as the nation at large, and the question is asked on all sides, What shall we do with the surplus revenue?

We have the means at hand in the surplus revenue that annually accumulates in our Treasury—a surplus revenue, by the way, that in a few years we shall not be able to apply to the abolition of our debt, unless we go into the market and purchase our own bonds at a premium. Then, why not turn a portion of this surplus revenue into a practical channel, that of ship-building and ship-carrying? The honorable Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER] made an estimate last May that the total subsidies paid to vessels engaged in foreign commerce by all the nations of the earth was less than $25,000,000 annually. I am informed upon competent authority that less than one-fifth of this sum steadily applied would establish an American merchant marine that would in a short time create for us a great industry, aid in finding new markets for American products, and place us on an equal footing with the other nations of the world in our foreign carrying trade.

If, however, it requires more than this, if it requires an amount equivalent to our entire surplus revenue, I claim that the proposed object of expenditure would be just and right. Other nations would undoubtedly struggle against it, but in such a struggle the nation with the greatest resources would win. That nation is the United States, and the time has come for her to assert and win her commercial supremacy on the ocean in the same manner and by the same means that in the last forty years she has established her commercial supremacy in the home market, by building up her own resources instead of being content to pay tribute forever to the foreign producer.

Great Britain would not give up this great source of wealth—the carrying trade—without a commercial struggle any more than she gave up her American colonies without a war. She would increase her subsidies, and to that extent we must be prepared to increase ours.

But in such a contest the United States will prove the stronger power and will survive. The people of England are now ground down under a system of taxation which enriches the few and impoverishes the many. Hoyle, the great authority on the English poor law and its workings, has estimated that 7,000,000 people of that island are, to use his expression, "toeing the line of pauperism." An increase of a million or two dollars in her budget has to be met with an increase of the income tax, while with our present taxation we have a large surplus which can be used in the struggle. We have paid more of our national debt in ten years than England has paid in sixty years. England is dependent upon other nations for the food her population consumes, while so boundless are our resources that we can live and flourish independently of the rest of the world.

Our system of taxation, which bears lightest upon those least able to pay, now brings us annually a surplus far greater than can possibly be needed. To secure for the United States pre-eminence in the world's carrying trade would complete her commercial system and make her the first commercial nation in the world. This is an object worth attaining. We have the means at hand, but we must apply them with boldness and vigor in order to succeed. It was only by decided measures, like those I shall propose, that England wrested the commercial supremacy from Holland. It is of no use to nibble at the question, and it is of no use to advocate anything but old-fashioned, vigorous, protective methods. The condition of our foreign shipping shows the blighting effect of free trade and the wonderfully prosperous condition of our coastwise shipping shows the beneficent effect of protection.

The measure proposed is a measure for the benefit of the entire country. It is not intended for the ship-builder along the seacoast. It is not intended for the capitalist, who puts his money into ships after they are built. It is not intended for any class, but is merely the extension of the policy of protection to this one industry which we have left unprotected, and a rounding or completion of the American system. It grants no subsidies. It is free to all. The railroads of this country annually carry nearly 300,000,000 tons of merchandise. Nearly one-third of this amount is the product of the farm, a large proportion of which is dependent upon ocean transportation before it reaches the consumer.

It has been clearly demonstrated that the protection given to American manufacturers has ultimately reduced the cost of all kinds of goods to the consumer until he, in many instances, pays less than the present foreign price for an article of equal quality, and much less than the foreign price would have been had we been dependent upon foreign countries. We paid the English manufacturers for steel rails $100 per ton, delivered at English seaports, when we imported them. By the development of our own steel industry the cost of those rails has been reduced to $30 per ton. We have reduced the price of wool because, by protection, we have increased its production from 60,000,000 pounds annually, when the Morrill tariff was enacted, to 325,000,000 pounds at the present time. We have reduced the price of our cotton goods so rapidly to the consumer that the common grades are cheaper here than in England. The same is true of our manufacture of silk, earthenware, china, porcelain-ware, plate-glass, and, in short, every manufactured article consumed in the United States.

The agricultural interests have been benefited in two ways by this: the value of land and the value of product have been enhanced, as hundreds of centers of manufacturing energy have been started and built up in the midst of agricultural districts. The farmers have also been benefited by the decrease in the cost of what they buy.

The encouragement of the American carrying trade would stimulate the shipping interests in the same way as the States forty years ago stimulated the building of canals, and as the United States has stimulated the building of railroads and the manufacture of steel rails and textile goods. And it would as surely decrease the cost of freight from the seaboard to foreign ports as these other protective measures have ultimately decreased the cost of internal transportation and the cost of manufactured goods.

It would also benefit the American farmer just as all other measures creating home industries have benefited the farmer. It would enlarge our ship-building interest and increase the number of people employed in it. And by this I do not mean the ship-building interest on the Delaware and of New England alone, but all along our seaboard. The iron of Alabama and Tennessee could be profitably converted into ships at Mobile, Savannah, New Orleans, and Galveston. The iron from the Virginias could be used in the same way at Norfolk. All of these ports would have extensive ship-yards if the same protection was extended to this industry that we extend to all others. The $100,000,000 paid annually to foreign nations, or to Great Britain, for carrying our farm products, would be paid to Americans, and thus increase the earnings of capital, which is awaiting new avenues of usefulness.

The proposed plan, while making a new avenue for capital, is free to all. It has no proscribed lines. To extend our foreign trade and find foreign markets for our products is its ultimate aim. It would form the most comprehensive feature of our present protective tariff. It says to every individual having a dollar to invest, put it into ships and the Government will protect you against all rivals; to the cotton producer, build your ships in Mobile, Norfolk, Savannah, Galveston, New Orleans, and put your cotton into these American vessels and send it to Europe. It says to the farmer on the Pacific coast, build your ships at Portland, at San Francisco, or any other port, and instead of sending your 30,000,000 bushels of wheat annually to Europe in foreign vessels, send it in American vessels. It says to the farmers of the prairie States, who ship nearly 50,000,000 tons of grain annually on her railroads, we will furnish you a cheaper transportation to the world's consuming points.

And more than this. The money which you now pay out for ocean freight, and which goes into the pockets of the builders and owners of foreign vessels, will come back to you and benefit you in the American labor that it will employ and in the American industries that it will build up. There are now 500,000 persons directly employed by the railroad companies of the United States. There are 2,000,000 to 2,500,000 of our population thus dependent upon this industry. There is no reason why our foreign carrying trade should not be extended until a like number is employed in it, and a like number of our population dependent upon it. And no one can estimate the value in time of war or emergency of having a large maritime population from which to obtain sailors for manning our war vessels. This population we can only get by fostering the mercantile marine.

No further argument is needed to prove that all parts of the United States will be benefited by the expansion of foreign trade.

It is generally admitted that our commerce flows in an improper channel and calls loudly to us to give it a different direction, and in doing this I would only propose such a degree of encouragement as will enable us to enter into competition with foreigners in our own carrying trade. For years the shipping industry of this country has been knocking loudly at the door of Congress for some kind of equitable legislation that will put this important industry on a level with the other protected industries of the nation. As I shall presently show, various measures of relief have been proposed, but, owing to the great prosperity of other industries and the numerous avenues for profitable investment, those propositions have never crystallized.

I will first call attention to our position in the world as a maritime nation. The following table shows the shipping of all flags, the nominal tonnage, and carrying power of the several nations of the world:

Flag.	Nominal tonnage.			Carrying power.
	Sailing.	Steam.	Total.	Tons.	Ratio.
United Kingdom	3,688,000	3,004,000	6,692,000	18,110,000	42.1

From the above table it will be seen that the carrying power of Great Britain is 42 per cent. of the aggregate carrying power of the world, while the carrying power of the United States is less than half as great, or a little more than one-fifth of the world's carrying power, and that, too, including our coastwise tonnage. Of foreign shipping the United States has much less than 10 per cent. Great Britain, therefore, ranks in shipping as we do in railroads, having a carrying power nearly equal to the rest of the world. At the beginning of the present century the carrying power of the United Kingdom was 2,211,000 tons. To-day it exceeds 18,000,000 tons, having grown eightfold since 1810. Nearly 200,000 seamen are employed in this great merchant marine, the flags of which may be found in the ports of every country throughout the civilized world.

What are the earnings of these ships and what proportion of the benefits of this carrying trade do the several countries reap for themselves? Here it is. The British includes colonial, and the table comprises all trade:

Flag.	Tons carried.	Earnings.
		Freight.	Passenger.	Total.	Ratio.
British	63,190,000	$307,000,000	$61,500,000	$368,500,000	55.2
French	6,100,000	29,500,000	6,000,000	35,500,000	5.4
German	6,200,000	30,000,000	6,000,000	36,000,000	5.4
Italian	3,900,000	18,500,000	4,000,000	22,500,000	3.3
Spanish	3,600,000	17,500,000	3,500,000	21,000,000	3.1
United States	37,000,000	52,500,000	77,500,000	130,000,000	19.6
Various	9,500,000	42,500,000	9,000,000	51,500,000	8.0
Total	129,490,000	497,500,000	167,500,000	665,000,000	100.0

Thus 55 per cent., or $368,500,000, of the earnings of shipping go into the coffers of Great Britain to enrich her ship-owners and manufacturers, while less than one-fifth of the total amount, or $130,000,000, is the share that comes to the United States; and this again includes the coasting trade. Of course these figures are approximate. They were originally compiled by Mulhall, the English statistician, and I only use them for comparative purposes.

In amount of ship-building England is even more in advance of us than in her carrying power and earnings of shipping; yet, as the following table shows, in 1850 the tonnage built in the United States was more than twice that of England, and even as late as 1860 the average annual output in the United States was greater than in England. In 1882 it will be seen that the British exceeded ours fourfold:

Year.	Tons.		Tons per vessel.
	American.	British.	American.	British.
1850	272,000	134,000	201	192
1860	213,000	212,000	198	208
1870	277,000	343,000	152	352
1882	281,000	1,194,000	250	770

The following figures for each semi-decennial year since 1840 will present at a glance the facts relating to the past and present condition of American shipping:

Years.	Foreign trade.	Coastwise trade.	Exports and imports.	Carried in American vessels.	Carried in foreign vessels.
	Tons.	Tons.	Value.	Per ct.	Per ct.
1840	762,838	1,176,694	$231,227,465	82.9	17.1
1845	904,476	1,223,218	231,901,170	81.7	18.3

1880	1,314,402	2,637,686	1,613,770,633	17.4	86.6
1881	1,297,035	2,646,011	1,675,024,318	16.0	84.0
1882	1,259,492	2,873,638	1,567,071,700	14.5	14.5

In other words, forty-five years ago four-fifths of our exports and imports were carried in our own ships, and now more than four-fifths are carried in foreign ships.

In the face of the growth that we have shown of railroads and manufactures this is a very unhealthy condition of affairs. The growth of American tonnage practically ceased in 1855. Before that period it had increased for many years at the rate of about 12 per cent. per annum; but between 1855 and 1860 (notwithstanding our exports and imports increased 8 per cent. per annum, or 40 per cent., during the five years) our tonnage employed in the foreign trade remained almost stationary; and the ship-building industry, so far as it was directed to the construction of vessels for the foreign trade, rapidly declined.

I shall show further along how during the four years of civil war American tonnage employed in foreign trade declined, a loss of nearly 1,000,000 tons, or nearly 40 per cent., in the four years, being the result of this turn in the tide against our shipping interests.

The situation to-day shows British shipping triumphant on every sea and ours successful on none, except in our coasting trade, where, in consequence of a wise protection, it is impossible to compete with us. When the policy of protection was judiciously applied to American ship-building and American ship-owning, as it was in the earlier days of the Republic, the result was satisfactory from the start. From 1789 to 1812 our tonnage increased from 208,000 to 1,100,000 tons, or 500 per cent.; while that of England increased only from 1,500,000 to 2,000,000, or 25 per cent. The growth of our tonnage continued. In 1850 we had a tonnage of 3,335,454, an increase of over 200 per cent. since 1815.

Our coasting trade, from which foreign ships were excluded, employed nearly 2,000,000 tons of shipping, an increase of nearly 400 per cent. in the same period. Our tonnage increased to over 5,000,000 in 1860. This growth, of course, was almost wholly in the wooden sailing ships. The war came and almost simultaneously the change from wood to iron and steel. The Navy Department took of our best shipping (principally steam) 565,978 tons; and the War Department took for transportation 787,611 tons. Having no navy to protect our shipping, it sought refuge under foreign flags, and 801,311 tons were lost to us in this way, making our total loss of tonnage during the war 2,154,900.

Between 1865 and 1875 I am informed that 457,000 tons were sold to foreigners, because the cheap capital, cheap labor, and favorable laws of taxation of other countries, and the refusal of our own Government to afford the shipping industry adequate protection, made it impossible for American ship-owners to run them in the foreign trade in competition with other countries. Thus we have a total decline of 2,611,900 tons, the loss representing nearly $116,000,000 of invested capital.

The capital thus displaced went into the protected industries of the country, which have during the last twenty years grown by leaps and bounds. Under the protective tariff we have grown from a purely agricultural country, largely dependent upon Europe for our manufactures, to a nation teeming with important industries. During twenty years of protection we have added 20,000,000 to our population. The number of our cities and towns with over 8,000 inhabitants has actually doubled, and their population has more than doubled. The important industries have developed in the same proportions. The annual product of our coal mines has increased nearly sevenfold. Our iron mines produced in 1880 nearly nine times the amount that they produced in 1860. The various metal industries of the country have increased by sixfold in the number of their employés and nearly fourfold in the value of their products. In industries relating to wood the increase has been threefold, and in the woolen industry the same.

In the cotton industry need I say that we have practically robbed England of 55,000,000 customers, increased the number employed in our mills to 200,000 persons, and in the last two decades doubled the value of the product? Imports of cotton goods have steadily declined until they are now only one-tenth of what they were twenty years ago. A more remarkable progress has been made in the silk industry, which, before the Morrill tariff, gave employment to 5,000 persons; in 1880 it employed over 30,000, a sixfold increase. The importation of silk goods has remained stationary since 1860 at about $30,000,000, the production from our own mills increasing from $6,000,000 in 1860 to over $40,000,000 in 1880, or nearly sevenfold. The manufacture of pottery, stoneware, and glass employed 12,000 persons in 1860, against 35,000 now. The chemical industry was in its infancy thirty years ago—6,000 persons were engaged in it; to-day there are five times that number, or 30,000.

Our 30,000 miles of railroads of those times will exceed 120,000 miles now—a mileage equal to the railroad mileage of the rest of the world.

This enormous increase in manufacturing, internal improvements, and home trade has been very largely due to protective measures, which must now be applied to our shipping interests in order that they may be developed and extended as our manufacturing interests have been. Those opposed to giving sufficient encouragement to ship-building ought to recollect the manufacturing interests, which, as I have shown, have been reared by the fostering care of the Government. They ought to remember the land grants that have been given to extend that grand system of internal improvements that is equal in mileage to the systems of the rest of the earth. They ought to remember that this Government has given in aid of the construction of railroads an area very little less in extent than that of the original thirteen States, namely, 335,000 square miles.

The same is true in regard to the artificial water ways of the country. In 1839 we find that nearly $103,000,000, or 60 per cent. of the then entire State indebtedness, had been expended for the improvement of a system of internal transportation, and it was exactly this principle which led the State of New York to build the Erie Canal at its own expense—a work which repaid its whole cost of construction in ten years, reduced the cost of freight from Lake Erie to the Hudson River from $100 to $7 a ton, and added $100,000,000 to the value of the farms of the State. It is needless to point out the effect of the application of this principle on these industries. It can be best read in the progress and wealth of the nation. It can be best read in the simple fact that we are to-day first in agricultural productions, first in manufacturing, first in railroads, first in annual increment of wealth, and first in aggregate wealth.

On the other hand, the neglect to apply this principle on the ocean has enabled our greatest competitor to wrest from us the lion's share of the carrying trade of the world and to effectually prevent the development of the industry of ship-building, so necessary to the prosperity and safety of the country, to say nothing of the extension of our foreign commerce.

In showing the policy of other governments toward the ship-building industry, I do not think it necessary to go back to the days of wooden sailing vessels. I shall have to deal with iron and steel ships. Since 1837, according to one of the most reliable authorities on ship-building in the United States, England has paid $222,500,000 in mail compensation and bounties to encourage her capitalists to invest in the fast mail ships. Here are the estimates in detail:

From general post-office, 1837 to 1849	$25,000,000
From mercantile marine fund	37,500,000
From general post-office, 1850 to 1859, over	60,000,000
From general post-office, 1860 to 1869	50,000,000
From general post-office, 1870 to 1879	50,000,000
Assistance from British treasury to her shipping service, 1837	222,500,000

It may be urged that a great deal of this money was paid for mail service to her colonies. This is undoubtedly true, but when we compare side by side the amounts paid for the carriage of foreign mail by the United States; and when we see our own Government actually trying to squeeze a profit out of our decaying shipping industry, as compared with the liberal policy adopted by Great Britian, we no longer wonder that England enjoys the largest share of the carrying trade, the surprise being that we are even permitted to have any. The entire cost of transporting our mails to foreign countries rarely exceeds a quarter of a million dollars, and not infrequently the Postmaster-General announces an actual profit of one million and a quarter to the Department on this service, while every year we incur cheerfully a deficit of double this amount in carrying the mails to some of the States and Territories.

Many attribute the decline that I have already shown in our ocean-carrying trade to what they term (it must be confessed not inaptly)

the iniquitous postal laws existing on the statute-books of the United States, which compel vessels of the United States to transport and deliver mails at 2 cents for every letter so delivered. The pay to United States vessels in the foreign trade for transporting the mails in 1880 was, I am informed, only 2½ cents per mile; while, at the same time, the steamers on our coasts, which contracted for domestic mails, receive 57½ cents per mile for mail service. While we make a profit on our foreign mail service, England pays out more than double what she receives from it.

I append a statement from the report of the Postmaster-General, showing our foreign mail service for 1883.

Turning to France, we find that she has aided her ship-owners for years, and quite recently, finding it impossible to obtain a great merchant marine by purchasing it of England, she passed a law offering a bounty for every iron steamship built in France—an encouragement said to be equal to $7,000,000 per year, including the sums paid to those running French-built ships under the French flag.

The following is a translation of the French mercantile-marine bill as passed by the Chamber of Deputies:

ARTICLE 1. The right of free pilotage is granted to all sailing vessels not measuring over eighty tons, and to steamers whose measurement does not exceed one hundred tons, whenever they run regularly between port and port, and habitually frequent the entrance to rivers.

Nevertheless, at the request of the Chamber of Commerce, and after an inquiry in the usual form has been made, the public administrative regulations shall determine the modifications of rules which may be considered necessary in the interest of navigation.

ART. 2. For foreign-going vessels, the visit of inspection prescribed by article 225 of the commercial code for a fresh cargo loaded in France shall not be obligatory unless six months have elapsed since the last inspection, except the vessel may have sustained damage.

ART. 3. For the official documents or procès-verbaux showing the changes of owners of the ship, either totally or partially, a fixed charge shall be made for registration of 5 francs. Article 5, No. 2, of the law of the 28th February, 1872, is repealed so far as it is contrary to the present provision.

ART. 4. To compensate ship-builders for the charges fixed by the custom-house tariff, the following allowance shall be made to them for gross tonnage:

For iron or steel vessels, 60 francs.

For wooden vessels of two hundred tons or more, 20 francs.

For wooden vessels of less than two hundred tons, 10 francs.

For composite vessels, 40 francs.

For engines placed on board steamers, and for auxiliary apparatus, such as steam-pumps, donkey-engines, winches, ventilators worked by machinery, also boilers and connecting pipes, 12 francs per hundred kilograms.

Ships planked with timber, having beams and ribs of iron or steel, are to be considered as composite vessels.

ART. 5. Every change in a ship by which an increase in measurement is gained shall give right to a bounty based on the above tariff according to the increase of tonnage gained.

A similar bounty shall be granted for driving-engines and auxiliary apparatus placed on board after completion of the ship.

On change of boilers, the owners shall be allowed a compensation of 8 francs per 100 kilograms on new boilers without the tubes, if of French make.

ART. 6. The fees granted by articles 4 and 5 shall be paid on delivery of the ship's register by the receiver of customs, at the port nearest to the place of construction.

ART. 7. The regulation of admission in bond fixed by article 1 of the law of the 19th of May, 1866, and by article 2 of the law of the 17th of May, 1879, is abolished.

ART. 8. Ship-builders shall receive allowance for vessels on the stocks at the time when the present laws came into force, as stipulated in articles 4 and 5, after deducting the amount of customs dues fixed by the conventional tariff on foreign imports, which may have been entered in bond for ship-building purposes.

ART. 9. As compensation for charges imposed on the mercantile navy for recruiting, and the military navy, a navigation bounty shall be granted, during ten years from the date of publication of this law, to all French vessels, sailing or steam. This bounty is applicable only to foreign-going vessels. It is fixed at 1 franc 50 centimes per register ton, and per 1,000 miles run for vessels fresh off the stocks, and decreases annually by 0.075 franc for wooden vessels, 0.075 for composite vessels, 0.05 franc for iron vessels. The bounty is increased by 15 per cent. for steamers built in France according to plans approved by the marine department. The number of miles run is calculated according to the distance from the point of departure to the point of arrival, measured on a direct maritime line. In case of war, merchant ships can be requisitioned by the state. Vessels used for fishing, those belonging to subsidized lines and yachts, are excepted from receiving a bounty. Twenty per cent. from the bounty granted by the present law shall be deducted and paid into the "Caisse des Invalides" of the marine, so as to increase the retiring pensions of registered seamen.

ART. 10. Every master of a vessel receiving a bounty fixed by article 9 of the present law shall be obliged to carry, free of charge, mails put under his charge by the post-office authorities, or which he will deliver to their administration, as prescribed in the consular decrees of the 19th Germinal, year X. If a post-office agent is deputed to accompany the dispatches, he shall also be conveyed free of charge.

ART. 11. A regulation of public administration, containing a special statement of the distances between ports, shall fix the system on which this law shall be applied.

To give a practical illustration of this new French bounty law, one of our well-known ship-builders was requested to apply it to a 3,000-ton steamer. The result is as follows:

Weight of iron in hull, 1,800 tons, at $12	$21,600
Weight of machinery, 500 tons, at $24.43	12,215
	33,815

Then there is allowed 30 cents per ton for every 1,000 miles run after being put in service for first year, diminishing 1 cent per ton for each year thereafter. Presuming the above 3,000-ton steamer makes ten trips from Havre to New York per annum, or 60,000 miles, this gives for first year's service, as follows:

Three thousand tons, at 30 cents = $900×60	$54,000
And second year's service	52,000

This will expire entirely at the end of thirty years. Adding the bounty and allowance per mile, the law would grant the 3,000-ton ship the first year $89,015. The French Government for this year requires in return the carrying of its mails and the right to use the ships in case of war, taking them at a fair valuation. Though this law seems an expensive one, yet it will furnish France, at small expense, with the materials for a large and sudden increase of the navy.

Germany contracts with her numerous navigation companies for certain amounts of mail pay and fosters her commercial interests in other respects, and at this moment bills are pending before the German Parliament to largely increase the assistance which it already gives to its shipping interest.

Italy expends in subsidies and postage to steamships yearly the sum of about $3,000,000, besides payments of postages to other lines.

Russia pursues a system of compensation to her steamship lines, paying $1.40 per mile, although to one line she pays a round subsidy.

Austria likewise pays a remuneration per marine league per voyage.

Even Belgium, out of her limited revenues, pays $250,000 a year to encourage her shipping interest.

Spain, Holland, and Brazil, and indeed it would be safe to say every civilized country, have found it necessary to encourage their own ship-building, and to give advantages to their own shipping. Even China is pursuing a policy of wonderful energy, and, after ruining the owners of the native junks, by permitting foreign ships to do its coasting trade, has finally secured the coasting trade of its great empire.

I append here a summary of what other nations are doing for their shipping industry, for which I am indebted to the honorable Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER], and which shows that other nations are paying nearly $25,000,000 annually as subsidies to their ships. It also brings out the ridiculously insignificant sum paid by the United States to American vessels for mail services.

*The United States to foreign ships $230,000.

Our direct loss in not having a sufficient merchant marine is at least the sum of $100,000,000 annually, which we pay to foreign vessels that ought to go to vessels built in American ship-yards. We are carrying only 20 per cent. of our foreign commerce in our own vessels, and have invested in ships engaged in the foreign carrying trade about one hundred million dollars. If we could regain and control four-fifths of this trade, we should have invested in ship property $300,000,000. Our foreign commerce is growing with great rapidity. From 1869 to 1879 our exports increased from 2,482,172 tons to 11,149,160 tons, or more than 400 per cent. It is estimated that we build only about 10 per cent. of the tonnage afloat, hence the country loses largely in the industry of building and repairing the shipping lost or broken up. In case of war we lose the advantage of a navy, to say nothing of valuable commercial business.

The indirect losses are educated ship-builders, seamen, and managers of ships—a very important class of people in Great Britain. We also lose a very important amount of marine insurance business.

After a thorough investigation of this subject an authority on navigation in the United States, Mr. Henry Hall, of the New York Tribune, said:

There appears to be no prominent government in the world which, while legislating directly in favor of native shipping, does not give it financial support, except the United States.

Having shown how all parts of the United States will be benefited by an expansion of foreign trade, and that our want of a merchant marine prevents us from taking that position which is rightfully ours, and having shown that the reason for the present unsatisfactory condition of our merchant marine is because the same principles that have been applied in building up our internal system of transportation, our manufactories, and our agricultural interests, have not of recent years been applied in the building up of the iron and steel ship-building industry; having also shown that other countries have seized the opportunities, and when the change from wood to iron and steel came, by subsidies, bounties, and other favorable legislation, have not only wrested from us a large part of the carrying trade which rightfully belongs to the United States, but so crippled our ship-building industry and obtained such advantages by cheap capital, cheap labor, and less taxation that we are rapidly being pushed out of the world's markets by other nations—having established this, it is next important to examine the various methods proposed to revive shipping.

Among the various remedies proposed are "free ships," the repeal of the navigation laws, the remission of local taxation, additional subsidies to mail lines, and other propositions, no one of which, in my opinion, goes deep enough to remedy and to be of real service. Nothing short of old-fashioned methods vigorously applied can deal with this question effectually. Free ships will merely destroy the ship-building industry and leave us as far behind as ever in competition in the world's commerce, I might more properly say our own foreign commerce.

The effect of the abolition of our navigation laws, even if they are inadequate and useless, as their enemies say they have become, would jeopardize our vast coasting trade, the fostering of which was one of the first measures of the first Congress. One of the very first acts of Congress, after the Government had been formed, was to exclude from the trade of our rivers and coast the vessels of all other nations.

From the beginning of the Republic we wisely discriminated in favor of American shipping. Not only was American shipping subject to less taxation than foreign shipping, but merchandise, such as tea, for example, which did not compete with our home industries, was admitted at a less rate of duty, if in an American ship direct from the place of production, than in an American ship from Europe or than in a foreign ship. This so stimulated American shipping that in 1827 $145,000,000 of the commerce of the United States was carried in American vessels and only $14,000,000 in foreign vessels. This condition of affairs, owing very largely to the wisdom and boldness which characterized our early legislation in regard to our marine, continued (though the rates of foreign tonnage increased somewhat) until 1850, when $240,000,000 of our foreign trade was carried in American vessels and $90,000,000 in foreign. We know how all this has been reversed.

It is not the building of vessels that troubles our people. We have abundance of ship-iron, and, though labor costs more, the greater ingenuity and mechanical genius of Americans have overcome these obstacles.

According to Mr. C. A. Griscom, who, as far as I can ascertain, has presented the clearest and most precise testimony in regard to the difference in the cost of ship-building here and in England, and which testimony has not been controverted even by the opponents of protection, the cost of first-class steamers is about 10 to 12 per cent. more in this country, and of the so-called "ocean tramps" from 30 to 40 per cent. more. The reason for this is apparent. To the extent that extensive joiner-work becomes a part of the structure, to that extent is the American cost relatively cheapened; and to the extent that you descend in the scale toward a simple freight carrier, which, as Mr. Griscom said, means merely an iron box with engines to drive it, is the difference against building in this country.

From the report made by Mr. DINGLEY, from the Joint Select Committee on American Ship-building, we learn that the committee, after examining a number of the most practical ship-builders in the United States, arrived at the conclusion that it now costs on an average from $10 to $15 per ton more to build an iron sailing vessel and from twenty-five to thirty-five dollars per ton more to build an iron steamship in the United States than it costs on the Clyde. They all agree that the chief cause of this excess of cost is the fact that the labor required to mine, smelt, and make the iron and fashion it into the form of a steamship costs considerably more in the United States than it does on the Clyde.

Prominent among the causes named for this enhanced cost was the fact of the small demand for iron vessels, as it gives little encouragement to investments of the large amounts of capital needed to establish and extend iron ship-yards and to overcome the obstacles always encountered in inaugurating new industries. The committee dwelt so strongly on this point that I am inclined to think that if the demand for American shipping was greater we could soon build them as cheaply, ton for ton, class for class, as they are built on the Clyde.

It is evident, therefore, that it is not a measure for free ships that we want, but a measure looking toward helping the American flag after the ships have been built in American ship-yards. There are many obstacles in the way of this—such as taxation, dear capital, dear labor, and other burdens. Not altogether in the original construction of the boat, for that, as I have shown, by ingenuity and adaptability has been in a measure overcome, but a steady addition of 50 per cent. on all the labor employed in running a ship, preoccupation of the northern Atlantic by other nations, non-American agitation, lack of that firm adherence to principles which characterized the actions of the founders of the Republic, when they enacted stringent navigation laws and discriminated in favor of goods carried in American bottoms as against vessels under other flags.

As I have said, one of the obstacles to our shipping interest is the amount of taxes levied upon ship property, the title of which must be registered at some port of entry. These taxes in some cases are as high as 2½ per cent., based on the value of the ships, while the English impose no direct tax upon their ships, but levy a tax of 1 per cent. on the net profits that the vessels earn.

The State of Massachusetts and the State of New York and, I think, possibly some other States have already realized the inconsistency of asking aid from the General Government for the shipping interest, while withholding what they can render themselves. They have, therefore, been among the first States to lead off and exempt from local taxation vessels engaged in the foreign trade for more than ten months in the year.

The same principles apply to navigating ships as apply to manufacturing. No man can run a factory on the American plan of high taxation, high capital, and high labor, successfully in England; and hence, unless our flag can carry our protective policy with it into all the ports of the world, we shall never be able to compete with foreign vessels.

Referring to the State laws, I find that they generally adopted the idea of discrimination. The State of Pennsylvania discriminated in favor of its own vessels and against those of other nations. So did the State of Maryland; the British vessels paying as much as 6*s.* 8*d.* ($1.60) per ton and 2 per cent. extra on goods imported over and above those paid by American vessels. The laws of Virginia and South Carolina discriminated in the same way.

Believing in the wisdom of the founders of this Republic and having proof of their foresight in the rapid development of American commerce until it was checked in 1860, having faith in the policy of Great Britain of subsidizing her steamships to the extent of $224,000,000 since 1837, recognizing the fact that the wisdom of that policy is demonstrated by her present control of the world's carrying trade, and with the example of nearly every other civilized country before us, I believe that we ought at once not only to correct existing legislation, such as that compelling American vessels to carry mails at an actual loss, but also at the same time lay the foundation for a comprehensive plan to restore American navigation.

We ought to provide for the payment of certain rates of compensation to all American-built ships, and I believe this to be better than by discriminating in the duties paid by imported merchandise, as originally proposed.

Vessels receiving aid should be officered by American citizens, built to carry a reasonable tonnage, and in all respects creditable to the nation, and should be encouraged in the foreign ocean carrying trade. The safest unit of service upon which payment to such vessels could be based would be the actual mileage run. The sum to be paid per unit of service should be such as to afford a protection equivalent to the average protection afforded American industries—say 40 per cent.

Mulhall estimates the monthly working expense for a vessel of 1,000 tons, crew twenty men, to be as follows:

British	$725
French	675
German	675
Austrian	625
Italian	475
American	1,000

If this estimate is approximately correct, the protection that should be afforded American ship-owners to compensate them for the difference in the cost of labor ought not to be less than 40 per cent. If such a plan as this can be adopted and put into force, our ship-building industry would increase in the same manner that our manufacturing and agricultural industries have, while our vessels would extend over the oceans and seas as our railroads have extended over our vast domain. Ten millions of our surplus revenue thus judiciously expended would in a few years bring about this beneficent result, and place us first in shipping and in foreign commerce. The method proposed is in direct keeping with what our ancestors did; it is in keeping with what we ourselves have done for every other of our great industries; it is in keeping with what other nations are doing, and the only practical way out of the difficulty.

In order to ascertain whether the French rate of 30 cents per ton would give us the needed protection, an expert investigation would be necessary. One of our ship-owners informs me that 40 cents per ton would give us the needed protection. Let us compare the American wages with the English.

Below are tables showing the average wages paid in England and America, which are taken from a speech delivered in the Senate (April 30 and May 1) by the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], and which were discussed at length in the Senate and generally admitted to be true.

The following table comprises the monthly wages paid by steamships at Philadelphia and Liverpool:

Occupation.	Philadelphia.	Liverpool.
First officer	$89 10	$58 39
Second officer	63 00	48 66
Third officer	49 50	34 06
Fourth officer	40 50	24 33
Surgeon	63 00	48 66
Purser	63 00	48 66
Carpenter	40 00	34 06
First boatswain	35 00	31 62
Second boatswain	30 00	24 33
Quartermaster	30 00	20 66
Seaman	25 00	19 46
Mess boy	13 50	7 29
First engineer	121 50	87 59
Second engineer	81 00	68 13
Third engineer	70 20	58 39
Fourth engineer	62 10	48 66
Oiler	40 50	23 11
Storekeeper	36 00	24 33
Donkeyman	36 00	23 11
Fireman	40 00	21 89
Coal-passer	30 00	19 46
Chief steward	63 00	48 66

Philadelphia wages 36 per cent. higher than wages at Liverpool.

The following list of prices are paid by sailing ships at present:

Occupation.	San Francisco.	Liverpool.
First mate	$50 00 60 00	$43 79 48 66
Second mate	40 00	29 19
Carpenter	35 00	29 19
Steward	35 00	34 06
Cook	30 00	24 33
Seaman	30 00	12 16
Ordinary seaman	15 00 20 00	9 73

Wages at San Francisco 33⅓ per cent. higher than at Liverpool.

It will be seen from these tables that the difference in seamen's wages alone is 36 per cent., and I am informed on reliable authority that it is, upon the whole, nearer 50 per cent.

The Forty-eighth Congress has passed two acts in relation to our merchant marine. The first was called an act to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign carrying trade, and the second was an act to constitute a bureau of navigation. These measures, while they may have been a move in the right direction, are entirely inadequate. The recent shipping law made some changes that were said to be needed in relation to the discharge of seamen, payment of wages, and return of destitute seamen; permitted the employment of foreign seamen; reduced the amount of tonnage duties for American vessels engaged in certain lines of trade; removed the expense of maintaining the Marine-Hospital Service from ship-owners, or, as a matter of fact, from the American seamen; allowed a drawback on all dutiable materials entering into the construction of vessels for foreign account, and, in short, made a complete circuit of the shipping problem without once touching the core of the question.

The House committee, in preparing and reporting the bill refefred to, frankly admitted that this problem will never be satisfactorily solved until a policy of protection has been inaugurated which will secure the carrying trade to American sailing and steam vessels after they are built, and this at no higher cost to the owners than English ship-owners can sail their vessels under British laws. This is the heart of the question.

The propositions of this same committee, which, however, were not incorporated in the act passed, to allow adequate compensation for the transportation of mails and to provide for the abolition of taxation of vessels by State authority, are both to be commended, perhaps, to those who believe in doing things by halves; but a complete revival of the foreign carrying trade is never to be had by half measures. None of the enacted or proposed measures go to the marrow of the question.

Hon. WILLIAM A. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts, made an interesting report upon the causes of the decadence of our merchant marine, and he came to the conclusion that of the ten elements urged as obstacles to our success, four, namely, tonnage duties, admeasurements, compulsory pilotage, and individual liability of ship-owners, impose no burdens upon the foreign carrying trade, which we are now seeking to restore, that are not borne by our competitors in this business. Four, namely, the privilege of taking ship-stores out of bond free of duty, extra pay to seamen discharged in foreign ports, excessive consular fees, and local taxation, are in a greater or less degree burdens which bear directly upon our vessels engaged in the ocean carrying trade, not borne by our rivals, and are questions that demand consideration, and which have subsequently, to some extent at least, been relieved.

The question of wages paid the seamen and the repeal or maintenance of the navigation laws are two other obstacles. The latter, which in its more common phrase means "free ships," is out of the question. The question of the wages paid to seamen can only be overcome by extending not only to the building of ships but to the running of them the same provisions and the same protection that we extend to manufacturers.

The following resolution was passed by the national convention of ship-owners by a vote of 63 to 14:

That results have clearly and forcibly proved that under the present condition of affairs our shipping can not prosper or even maintain itself in competition with the navigation of other maritime people: therefore we call upon the Government to aid the restoration of our commerce by granting a bounty of $—— per ton per year for sail tonnage, and $—— per ton per year for steam tonnage, for a period of —— years after the passage of this act; this to apply only to vessels engaged in the foreign trade, and not exceeding fifteen years of age.

The above is in the line that I propose. It was passed after a long debate, in which the details of reasons or causes were set forth at length. These reasons were founded on the cost of vessels themselves, the cost of service, the absence of just compensation for postal business, and the existence of obstructive practices and charges in pilotage, tonnage measurements, and tonnage dues. I have endeavored to touch on all these points, but not with the same degree of thoroughness and detail as those shipping experts did.

To sum them up, the points to be considered are:

1. The relative cost of construction of American and foreign vessels and the extent to which American ship-owning is affected thereby.
2. The relative cost of operating American and foreign ships.
3. The charges and taxes which American ships have to pay from which foreign ships are exempt.
4. The policy pursued by foreign powers, so far as it is hostile to American ship-owning.
5. The policy of Government aid to the shipping interest.

On all these points and many others it was shown at the ship-builders' convention, as I have endeavored to show to-day, that American ships are now at a disadvantage as compared with foreign ships of almost every country. I have to-day explained the general principle on which relief must be based. The advice of experts will have to be obtained before I can incorporate this principle in a bill, which I intend to do at the next session.

Mr. President, I have given this subject long and careful consideration, and have endeavored to discover the reasons why the shipping interest has not prospered. It is because it was not fostered. The enterprising, restless, ambitious, and adventurous youth of this country for a half century have been pushing westward, where obstacles were to be overcome and fortunes made, and there they have established great enterprises, produced wealth in fabulous amounts. Now, however, they are anxious for new fields to open for their enterprise. Start them on the ocean, and the same American force and energy will soon push to the front, and we shall again be mistress of the seas. What has taken other people centuries to accomplish can and will be done by our people in a single generation. The accomplishing power of Americans has never been appreciated. Whether it is the mixed blood, the clear, bracing atmosphere, the vast domain, the freedom from restraint, and the effort to rise in the social scale, or whether it is the combination of all these, I can not tell, but certain it is that our growth in all material interests is phenomenal.

I have shown you that the United States is to-day first in agriculture, first in manufacture, first in railroads, first in annual increments of wealth, and the measure I propose will, I believe, give us in addition the control of the carrying trade, and thus make us the first commercial nation in the world. In the well-known article published in the North American Review a few years since by Mr. Gladstone, he says:

It is she (the United States) alone who, at a coming time, can and probably will wrest from us that commercial primacy. We have no title—I have no inclination to murmur at the prospect. If she acquire it, she will make the acquisition by the right of the strongest; but in this instance the strongest means the best. She will probably become what we are now, the head-servant in the great household of the world, the employer of all employed, because her service will be the most and ablest. We have no more title against her than Venice, or Genoa, or Holland has had against us.

Do we realize this? Do we comprehend that the world's carrying trade is within our grasp if we only take the proper steps to seize it? And above all things it must be remembered that the measure I propose is not a measure to benefit any particular class. It is a national measure. It holds out the same inducements to every one in this broad land. It says to the farmer, we mean to give you facilities to reach every market in the world. We propose to protect our producers until their products meet the consumer, in whatever part of the world he may be found. If a Chinaman in Hong-Kong wants cotton goods, we propose to enable our cotton planters and manufacturers to deliver it to him cheaper than any one else can. If hardware is needed on the Congo, we propose that our hardware merchants shall supply it cheaper than any one else. If food is needed in England, we propose that our farmers shall deliver it cheaper than it can be bought from any of the English colonies.

Who will derive the most advantages from it? The American producer, be he farmer or be he manufacturer. He can have his goods transported at a very low rate, because the ship-owner can afford to do it. Therefore it may be truthfully said that this aid given by the Treasury of the United States, and assessed on the general interests of the country, would be one of the best means of developing our agricultural interests by cheapening transportation from the place of production to the place of consumption in whatever portion of the globe it may be.

And now, sir, one word in conclusion. We have had propositions before us for the last ten years for the revival of our shipping. Few of them have been carried, and none of them, it must be frankly confessed, have excited the interest that they deserved. And I think the reason has been that people did not really care much about the carrying trade, because there were so many other channels open to commercial enterprise. The building of railroads, the opening up of the great West, the development of manufactures—all these have afforded favorable opportunities for the investment of capital; and in them the entire capital and labor of the country has found full employment. Now, however, with our extraordinary growth we have reached a point where these pursuits do not offer inducements to capital, and consequently both capital and labor are idle.

The commercial conquest of our own country by our own people is complete. We have more railroads and factories and agricultural products than we need for our own use. Shall we then lie idle and wait till we grow up to the capacity of our industries? I say, no; but rather let us push our way boldly into foreign markets. To do this we must have our own shipping, and we can only get it by protection—by the same means that have given us such an unexampled development at home. At last, therefore, the time is ripe for the revival of the shipping interest, because that is the instrument by which all industries and all commercial interests can be revived. I therefore ask the earnest attention of the Senate to the measure, or more properly the principle, which I advocate, the protection of the ship-building and ship-carrying interests; not only and not chiefly for the sake of those interests themselves, but because in the present condition of affairs by reviving these interests we shall set in motion the wheels of trade in every one of its branches. By adopting these principles I confidently believe that in less than a generation we shall be mistress of the seas and command the markets of the world as completely as to-day we control the markets of our own broad land.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILSON in the chair). The question is on the resolution.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a House bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let this resolution be referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The resolution was agreed to.

UNLAWFUL OCCUPANCY OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5479) to prevent unlawful occupancy of the public lands, known as the fencing bill. It is reported from the Committee on Public Lands with some amendments. The report of the committee of the Senate is unanimous, and therefore the bill will probably not provoke any discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him. Is there objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. One word. I desire simply to say that I have examined the Calendar and there are only forty-nine House bills upon the Calendar which have been reported favorably by Senate committees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri object to the request of the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. COCKRELL. I intend to object at the proper time to all others except this bill now. I simply desire to give notice that I shall move in connection with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] either to-day, or, if the time is too far gone now, to-morrow, to take up the House bills and consider them in their consecutive order. We can dispose of all of them inside of an hour and a half, I am satisfied.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 5479) to prevent unlawful occupancy of the public lands.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 6, after the word "to," to strike out "all" and insert "any;" and in line 19, after the word "prohibited," to strike out:

And it shall be lawful for any person to tear down, cut, or demolish any such inclosure as is above prohibited, when the inclosure includes more than one hundred and sixty acres of land.

So as to make the section read:

That all inclosures of any public lands in any State or Territory of the United States heretofore or to be hereafter made, erected, or constructed, by any person, party, association, or corporation, to any of which land included within the inclosure the person, party, association, or corporation making or controlling the inclosure had no claim or color of title made or acquired in good faith, or an asserted right thereto by or under claim made in good faith at the proper land office, under the general laws of the United States at the time any such inclosure was or shall be made, are hereby declared to be unlawful, and the maintenance, erection, construction, or control of any such inclosure is hereby forbidden and prohibited; and the assertion of a right to the exclusive use and occupancy of any part of the public lands of the United States in any State or any of the Territories of the United States, without claim, color of title, or asserted right as above specified as to inclosure, is likewise declared unlawful, and hereby prohibited.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 10, after the word "proper," to insert "United States district or circuit;" in line 14, after the word "any," to insert "United States district or circuit;" in line 15, after the word "court," to strike out "of record;" and in line 28, after the word "way," to strike out "with a posse comitatus, if necessary;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the district attorney of the United States for the proper district, on affidavit filed with him by any citizen of the United States that section 1 of this act is being violated, showing a description of the land inclosed with reasonable certainty, not necessarily by metes and bounds nor by Governmental subdivisions of surveyed lands, but only so that the inclosure may be identified, and the persons guilty of the violation, as nearly as may be, and by description if the name can not on reasonable inquiry be ascertained, to institute a civil suit in the proper United States district or circuit court, in the name of the United States and against the parties named or described who shall be in charge of or controlling the inclosure complained of as defendants; and jurisdiction is also hereby conferred on any United States district or circuit court having jurisdiction over the locality where the land inclosed, or any part thereof, shall be situated, to hear and determine proceedings in equity, by writ of injunction, to restrain violations of the provisions of this act; and it shall be sufficient to give the court jurisdiction if service of original process be had in any civil proceeding on any agent or employé having charge or control of the inclosure; and any suit brought under the provisions of this section shall have precedence for hearing and trial over other cases on the civil docket of the court, and shall be tried and determined at the earliest practicable day. In any case, if the inclosure shall be found to be unlawful, the court shall make the proper order, judgment, or decree for the destruction of the inclosure in a summary way, unless the inclosure shall be removed by the defendant within five days after the order of the court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 10, after the word "lands," to strike out "not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres" and insert "under the land laws of the United States;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That no person, by force, threats, intimidation, or by any fencing or inclosing, or any other unlawful means, shall prevent or obstruct or shall combine and confederate with others to prevent or obstruct any person from peaceably entering upon or establishing a settlement or residence on any tract of public land subject to settlement or entry under the public-land laws of the United States, or shall prevent or obstruct free passage or transit over or through the public lands: Provided, This section shall not apply to persons who have gone upon, improved, or occupied said lands under the land laws of the United States, claiming title thereto in good faith.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, line 2, after the word "agent," to strike out "attorney or employé," and in line 6, after the word "offense," to strike out:

And the continuance of an unlawful inclosure after conviction or pending prosecution shall be deemed another offense.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That any person violating any of the provisions hereof, whether as owner, part owner, or agent, or who shall aid, abet, counsel, advise, or assist in any violation hereof, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and fined in a sum not exceeding $1,000 and be imprisoned not exceeding one year for each offense.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 5. That the President is hereby authorized to take such measures as shall be necessary to remove and destroy any unlawful inclosure of any of said lands, and for such purpose to employ civil or military force, as may be necessary for that purpose.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The words "for such purpose" occur in line 3, and the words "for that purpose" in line 4. Let the words "for such purpose," in line 3, be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment is, in line 3, to strike out the words "for such purpose." If there be no objection the amendment will be so modified. The question is on the amendment of the committee as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. GARLAND. Is there a report with this bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is.

Mr. GARLAND. Let the report be read. Some Senators may not understand it.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. VAN WYCK January 12, 1885:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred bill H. R. 3479, beg leave to submit the following report:

That they have suggested certain amendments, which will appear in the body of the bill.

The necessity of additional legislation to protect the public domain because of illegal fencing is becoming every day more apparent. Without the least authority, and in open and bold defiance of the rights of the Government, large, and oftentimes foreign, corporations deliberately inclose by fences areas of hundreds of thousands of acres, closing the avenues of travel and preventing the occupancy by those seeking homes. While those fencing allege the lands within such inclosures are open to settlement, yet no humble settler, with scarcely the means for the necessaries of life, would presume to enter any such inclosure to seek a home.

The Government has sufficient authority to drive those seeking homes from the Indian Territory, and to burn the ranches of those invading the Yellowstone Park, while those appropriating vast areas are hoping the only remedy to be used against them will be the law's delay in the courts.

Therefore your committee have added a new section to the Army bill, authorizing the President of the United States to summarily remove all obstructions, and, if necessary, to use the military power of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill if it compels the taking down of these unlawful inclosures.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Certainly; that is the intention.

Mr. COCKRELL. I see that by section 2 proceedings may be commenced upon the affidavit of any citizen of the United States. The judgment of the court is that the man shall take down his fence. Who is to pay the costs and all that?

Mr. VAN WYCK. The party against whom the judgment is rendered will pay the costs. If the Senator will examine the whole bill he will see that was the only remedy by the House bill as it came to us. We added to the bill, to make it more stringent and summary, the provision of the law of 1870, which in my judgment is still in force, but has not been recognized as in force by the Interior Department. That provision authorized the President of the United States to use the military force to remove unlawful obstructions. The committee intended to meet the very point which I think the Senator has suggested.

Mr. PLUMB. I think if the Senator from Missouri will read section 4 he will not object to the bill as not being stringent enough.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have read section 4, but how are you going to enforce it? The section provides:

That any person violating any of the provisions hereof, whether as owner, part owner, or agent, or who shall aid, abet, counsel, advise, or assist in any violation hereof, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and fined in a sum not exceeding $1,000, and be imprisoned not exceeding one year for each offense.

How is that to be enforced?

Mr. PLUMB. It is to be enforced by an action in the courts of the United States just as all other offenses against United States laws are punished.

Mr. MORGAN. I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the concluding clause of the second section:

In any case, if the inclosure shall be found to be unlawful, the court shall make the proper order, judgment, or decree for the destruction of the inclosure in a summary way, unless the inclosure shall be removed by the defendant within five days after the order of the court.

That seems to be a very full remedy for the destruction of inclosures by order of the court, and I think that is the proper way to get at it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. CONGER. It seems to me that the provisions of the first section of the bill would prevent the settlement of any person, a squatter if you will say so, on any of the unsurveyed public lands of the United States and make him liable to punishment and penalties. It makes no discrimination for an actual settler. Of course he could have no title and could acquire none, for there would be no land office where he could acquire any title.

I think the bill is dangerous in that respect, and instead of punishing those who occupy and inclose large tracts of country it leaves citizens of the United States liable to prosecution for going and attempting to make a settlement on lands that have not been surveyed, and where there is no land office. Perhaps I may be mistaken about it. It punishes those who may make or control an inclosure who have—

No claim or color of title made or acquired in good faith, or an asserted right thereto by or under claim made in good faith at the proper land office, under the general laws of the United States at the time any such inclosure was or shall be made.

There are settlements made in remote parts of the country, where there is no land office, where there has been no survey, with the intention of securing a future homestead there—what we call a squatter's right. I think this provision, without some amendment of it, would make such settlers liable to penalty and prosecution.

Mr. PLUMB. I think the Senator is mistaken in that. He will find that two classes of claims are provided for in the section which he objects to. Possibly it might be made a little more certain. The first class excepted from the operation of the section is persons who have made claim or color of title acquired in good faith. Under the public land laws entry upon the public lands in accordance with the provision of the law which authorizes persons to go there for the purpose of effecting a settlement under the land laws is the assertion of a claim or color of title, I think, fairly within the meaning of this section. Then there is another class of claims provided for, and that is where the right has been asserted in good faith at the proper land office. It seems to me that the class of claims to which the Senator refers is covered by that provision. Of course it would be made perhaps a little broader if the words "the proper land office" were stricken out, but I do not think that is necessary, because of the first clause which refers to the persons who have a claim or color of title acquired in good faith.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. PLUMB. This bill has proceeded so nearly to a conclusion that I think it would be a saving of time for the Senate to close the consideration of it this morning.

Mr. CONGER. Let the bill go over and be examined a little. There may be no objection to it hereafter. Let it go over to another morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business and will then entertain the request of the Senator from Kansas to proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I will assent cheerfully to the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan if it can be understood that the bill shall be taken up again in the morning hour to-morrow.

Mr. CONGER. There will be no objection, I presume, to taking it up at some time when it can be examined.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan object?

Mr. CONGER. I should rather have it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan objects.

COINAGE OF SILVER DOLLARS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4976) for the retirement and recoinage of the trade-dollar, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. INGALLS to strike out section 5 of the substitute reported from the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I shall endeavor as briefly as I can to show why the first three sections of the bill reported by the Finance Committee, being an amendment to the House bill retiring the trade-dollar, should pass; that done, I shall endeavor to show why we should not at this time interfere with the coinage of the standard silver dollar, or commit ourselves to any future change of policy in regard to it.

When the bill was reported from the Finance Committee and argued so elaborately by the chairman [Mr. MORRILL] and so ably by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD], I took occasion to announce that the report was not a unanimous one. Several of the committee, of whom I was one, were entirely satisfied to retire the trade-dollar, but we thought that there was neither a necessary nor natural connection or relation between the subjects, indeed that it was irrelevant and improper to attach to such a bill a measure to stop the coinage of the standard silver dollar either now or hereafter. The House had sent us a very simple proposition; the Senate Finance Committee amended it, and, I think, properly; but to tack onto it the whole question of silver coinage, which involves very serious consequences, seemed to me to be just as much out of place as it would have been to have tacked on an amendment proposing to build new cruisers, or to attach the river and harbor bill or any other measure entirely foreign to the subject that the House had asked us to deal with. The rider is bigger than the horse; the tail wags the dog in this case.

The only effect of insisting upon retiring the standard silver dollar on a proposition to retire the trade-dollar and substitute standard legal-tender dollars for it is in fact to do nothing; it simply means the defeat of the bill, which a majority of the committee, and I think a majority of the Senate, would like to see passed. Therefore, as I said, I shall endeavor to show why we ought to retire the trade-dollar, and why we ought not to deal with the other subject at all, because it must be obvious that when we do it is important enough to be brought before us as a separate matter to be discussed fully, elaborately, and carefully by both Houses, and not be made a rider to a bill to which it has no necessary or proper relation in the closing hours of a session and in the expiring days of an administration.

The Committee on Finance of the Senate have never found any difficulty before this body in obtaining a hearing when they make a report upon any important question, and I do not see why we ought now, on a bill like this, to say that we will do what the House proposes provided they will agree to stop the coinage of the silver dollar. We might as well propose to pass the bill sent to us provided they would agree to build up the Navy, or provided they would establish a manufactory for great guns, or make the Commissioner of Agriculture a Cabinet minister, or provided they would agree to do anything that was not in any way connected with the subject-matter under consideration. In my judgment that is not the way to deal with a great question of this sort.

I am one of those who have believed ever since the legal-tender quality was taken from the trade-dollar that it ought to be retired, and I have not failed since I have been a member of the Senate to introduce bill after bill during three Congresses for the purpose of substituting legal-tender standard dollars for it. I thought that good faith to the country, good faith to the laborers who were for years compelled to take those trade-dollars for their daily wages, and yet were unable to pay them out for the rent of their homes, or for the clothes their families needed, or for groceries or anything else, required Congress to retire them and substitute for them a coin having the qualities which all money allowed to circulate ought to have.

During the first Congress in which I had the honor to be a member of this body, before I was a member of the Finance Committee, on the 2d of December, 1878, the first day of the third session of the Forty-fifth Congress, I introduced a bill to provide for retiring the trade-dollar and for its recoinage into standard silver dollars. It was referred to the Committee on Finance after being twice read, and never was heard of any more. At the next Congress, the Forty-sixth, I was, by the kindness of Senators, made a member of the Finance Committee, and thought I would be able to do something in that regard. At the first special session, without waiting for the regular session, on the 21st day of March, 1879, I introduced Senate bill No. 70, it being a bill to provide for retiring the trade-dollar and for its recoinage into standard silver dollars. That, too, was referred to the Finance Committee, and died there as the former bill had done. Not content with that, still hoping to get rid of the dishonored coin, when the Forty-seventh Congress met on the 5th of December, I believe the very first day of the Congress, I again introduced Senate bill No. 84, to provide for the retirement of the trade-dollar, and it again went to the Finance Committee, and never was heard of any more. When this Congress met the evils which I was seeking to remove had comparatively passed away. Trade-dollars were not being paid to laborers any more; they were not being required to take them for wages. They had been dishonored everywhere. Our own post-office officials and fiscal agents had driven them out of circulation. I did not introduce a bill to retire them when this Congress opened; they had passed into the hands of associations of bankers and brokers. The men who had obtained them doubtless took them from the laboring classes at a heavy discount in most instances, I know they did in many, yet I knew that through their press, with their organizations and their united power, they would make themselves felt even by Congress in a way that I had not been able to make myself felt when advocating the cause of the people who had taken this degraded money for their wages, and that they would enlist champions more potent than I had proved to be.

I guessed right. It was not long before the press, especially of Philadelphia, sustained by the press of the almost united North, the bankers, the brokers, the moneyed organizations everywhere, demanded that the trade-dollar should be retired. The House acted upon their demand promptly. The Senate committee held it back for a long time. The Finance Committee of the body was pressed to report on this subject in some way at the last session of this Congress; they did not, but they report now, and when they do they attach a condition in the form of a rider to it, which, if not intended to defeat the bill, overthrows or looks to the overthrow of the whole silver coinage of the country.

I do not desire to be understood as saying that the trade-dollar ought not to be retired now. I think it ought, and for the same reasons that I sought to retire it during the three previous Congresses. I do not care whether the present holders of them took them at par or at a discount, whether they obtained them by gift or by purchase or in any other way. They are outstanding, after being dishonored by Congress. They are the coin of the United States. They were issued by our authority. Their legal-tender quality, which was all that enabled men to use them to supply their wants, was taken away from them by law. My position has always been that the moment that was done it became the duty of the United States to retire its repudiated coin and to substitute a coin which the people could use. Whether they are held by brokers or bankers, or whether they are held by Shylocks who preyed upon the necessities of the laborers in order to get them below their value, it makes no difference to me; they ought not to exist, and Congress ought not to allow them to remain outstanding.

The only excuse that I have heard offered by any gentleman who differs with me is that they are not a coin of the United States; that they were coined for the private benefit of the men who owned silver bullion, and that we are therefore under no obligation to retire them or substitute legal-tender dollars for them. Indeed, the Senator from Vermont went so far as to say that they were given a legal-tender value even to the extent of $5 by accident, by inadvertence, in 1873. Let me quote his exact language. He said:

> It is true that by some inadvertence it happened to be included as a legal tender by the coinage act of 1873, the same as subsidiary silver coins, to the extent only of $5 for three years, or until July 22, 1876, when even its limited legal-tender character was repealed. Up to that time the whole amount issued was $15,118,450.

He said further along in his speech "somebody blundered" in making them legal-tender, and argues that because it was done by inadvertence Congress ought not to take any notice of them. I deny his statement of facts. There was no inadvertence about it. Section 3511 of the Revised Statutes provides that—

> The gold coins of the United States shall be a one-dollar piece, which, at the standard weight of 25.8 grains, shall be the unit of value; a quarter-eagle, or two-and-a-half-dollar piece; a three-dollar piece; a half-eagle, or five-dollar piece; an eagle, or ten-dollar piece.
> SEC. 3513. The silver coins of the United States shall be a trade-dollar, a half-dollar, or fifty-cent piece, a quarter-dollar, or twenty-five-cent piece, a dime, or ten-cent piece.

Giving the weights respectively of these. Then follows a further provision which, I think, is a complete answer to all gentlemen who are contending that they are not as much coin of the United States as gold coin because they were coined for the private use of individual men. They were coined by law, just as the gold coin of the United States was coined. Section 3519 of the Revised Statutes says:

> Any owner of gold bullion may deposit the same at any mint, to be formed into coin or bars for his benefit.
> SEC. 3520. Any owner of silver bullion may deposit the same at any mint, to be formed into bars, or into dollars of the weight of 420 grains troy, designated in this title as trade-dollars, and no deposit of silver for other coinage shall be received.

Congress by the act of July, 1873, had stricken down the old silver dollar, but as to the trade-dollar it was provided that silver bars and bullion were to be received at our mints and coined for the benefit of the person who deposited the silver bullion, just as the gold was to be coined for the benefit of the man who deposited the gold bullion. No distinction was made between them. When I called the attention of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] to that subject I said to him that there was no distinction, and I believe with the exception of giving to the holder of gold the right to sell or the Government the right to purchase whatever silver was found mixed with the gold, for we were buying silver for subsidiary coin, he failed to show any distinction. I called attention also to the fact that it was made a felony and is a felony to-day to counterfeit any of these coins of gold or silver, the trade-dollar included.

Section 61 of the act of February, 1873—the section of the Revised Statutes from which I have read being part of it—provides "that if any person or persons shall falsely make, forge, or counterfeit, or cause or procure to be falsely made, forged, or counterfeited, or willingly aid or assist in falsely making, forging, or counterfeiting, any coin or bars in resemblance or similitude of the gold or silver coins or bars, which have been, or hereafter may be, coined or stamped at the mints and assay offices of the United States, or in resemblance or similitude of any foreign gold or silver coin which by law is, or hereafter may be made, current in the United States, or are in actual use and circulation as money within the United States, or shall pass, utter" the same, he shall be guilty of a felony, and all the penalties prescribed by the statute shall be imposed upon him precisely the same for silver coin, for the trade-dollar, as for the gold eagle; there is no difference between them. The Senator from Delaware very pertinently answered his own argument in his speech in regard to the difference between the two coins when he said:

> Mr. President, since 1878, I think in February, the Government of the United States has assumed a new relation, a new function and duty in respect to its coinage. Before that time, except for the manufacture of its subsidiary coins which are debased below the standard coins, the Government of the United States never owned an ounce of either metal that came into its mints for coinage; all that came was private property.

Yet all had full legal-tender quality and were coins of the United States for all purposes.

That is true; true as well of the gold coin as of the trade-dollar; true as well of one coin as of another, so that there is no weight in the argument that the trade-dollar was coined for the private benefit of the persons who brought the bullion to the mint any more than could be based upon the fact that the gold coin was coined for the benefit of the men who brought the gold bullion there for coinage. When we demonetized or deprived the trade-dollar of its legal-tender quality by joint resolution in 1876 there was no attempt to deprive it of its existing relation as a coin of the United States further than to take away its legal-tender quality. The Senator from Delaware thought there was, but when he came to read the law he found, I think to his own satisfaction, that there was not. This is the language. I will read it so that there may be no mistake about the facts in regard to it. July 22, 1876, the legal-tender quality was taken away from the coinage of the trade-dollar, and this was added:

> And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to limit from time to time the coinage thereof to such an amount as he may deem sufficient to meet the export demand for the same.

That was not altering its quality; that did not make it less a coin of the United States, but it gave authority to our agent, the Secretary of the Treasury, to limit the amount to be issued to what he might deem was necessary for the foreign export trade. But all that he saw fit to allow to be issued, all that he saw fit to allow to go into circulation in the hands of the people, was as much a coin of the United States, and was paid out to men for their days' wages just as freely as before that act was passed, and very likely a good deal more so. If any one was to be blamed for allowing the dishonored and useless trade-dollar to be issued at all after 1876 it was the Secretary of the Treasury. He was the agent of the authorities of the United States. Congress trusted him and invested him with power. The people of the United States, to whom that money was paid in small sums and wages could not tell what the Secretary of the Treasury was doing or what his object was in allowing that coin to be issued in the way it appeared. It found its way into the hands of their employers. They may have bought the silver bullion at 10 or 15 per cent. discount from which to coin it to pay their hands with, or they may have paid par for it. So it was these trade-dollars were paid to them on Saturday night for their wages. They believed it to be good money, they hoarded it, they held on to it, they thought it better than depreciated paper, they believed that the Secretary of the Treasury, under the authority given to him, was doing his duty and was giving them a good, honest coin, and that the United States would protect them in taking it, if they thought or knew anything about it at all.

I remember upon one occasion in a town in my own State, for we had great trouble there with it for years, an honest German had collected $65 in silver coin, trade-dollars every one of them. He had taken them for his chickens, his butter, his eggs, and the things he was selling at the market-house and had laid them away until he had sixty-five. He and his wife came into the town to get a draft to send to some dependent relative in Germany, when it was found they were trade-dollars; the bank refused to take them at par, the United States officials and everybody was refusing them; the German gardener had to suffer 10 per cent. discount on his $65 to get the little draft he desired to send abroad. That ought not to be; it ought never to have been possible. It was a common case. I only use it to illustrate the general condition. When we issued a coin and punished men for counterfeiting it and authorized our Secretary of the Treasury to let as many be issued as he saw fit—and he did see fit to let thirty-five millions be issued—every one of them that has not been adopted by foreign nations and branded with the brand of a foreign country that is now here unchanged, no matter who holds them, ought to be retired and a good dollar that will pay the rent of the laborer's house, that will pay his bill at the grocery, that will buy himself a pair of shoes or clothes for his family, and that he can require everybody to take as he has to take it, should be given to him in its place. That is the only fair and honest solution of the question. A Government like this can not afford to higgle about technicalities.

It will not do to say, as has been argued here, that values can not be changed or created by law; that there is no difference between the value of money as a coin and its value as a merchantable article. The very fact that the holders of trade-dollars are willing and anxious to take a coin of 412½ grains and give up for it a dishonored coin containing 420 grains shows that they know that there is a difference in value because of the uses to which the one can be put and to which the other can not. All the financiers of the country have insisted upon that being the effect of the legal-tender quality. Mr. Hamilton in his earliest report, in 1792, when he started the United States Mint—I do not care to take time to read much—showed that we were at the mercy of foreign nations, and that the values of the coin we used depended upon action abroad on the values the foreign countries saw fit to give them. The reason why the States gave up the right to coin money was because of these differences and changes in value in different coinage. I will read one extract however. It covers the whole case. In his report of 1791 Mr. Hamilton used this language:

> Every fabric, it is remarked, is worth intrinsically the price of the raw material and the expense of fabrication—a truth not less applicable to a piece of coin than to a yard of cloth.
> This position, well founded in itself, is here misapplied. It supposes that the coins now in circulation are to be considered as bullion, or, in other words, as a raw material; but the fact is that the adoption of them as money has caused them to become the fabric; it has invested them with the character and office of coins, and has given them a sanction and efficiency equivalent to that of the stamp of the sovereign. The prices of all our commodities at home and abroad, and of all foreign commodities in our markets, have found their level in conformity to this principle.

Mr. Hunter, in 1853, when the same question was up, repeated the same idea when he said, speaking of gold and silver:

> These metals derive their value from two distinct sources—one from their use as a currency, the other from their application to manufacturing purposes. The demand for them as currency in any given year is to be measured by the number and amount of exchanges to be made in specie during that year—their value for mechanical uses is their bullion value—that is to say, it is measured by their proportion to the residue of the property of the world, for the demand for them in the arts will be very nearly in proportion to the wealth of society.

These principles regulate the value of our coins; it is the use to which we by law allow the 412½-grain dollar to be applied when we do not allow the 420-grain dollar to be used for any public purpose that gives the former greater value. Its value is governed by the uses to which it can be put. It is a fabric. What would be the use of even the celebrated Wood's self-binder, which has revolutionized the grain-raising of the country, if we were to pursue the policy of China in order to prevent labor from being driven out of employment, and say it should not be used? The raw material is there, but you can not use it, and there is no practical value in it to anybody, no matter how great its capacity. If the 420-grain dollar will not pay a debt, will not pay house-rent, will not buy shoes, will not procure clothing, will not buy the necessaries of life, it is of no value to a laboring man who holds it; it is not a fabric, and he can not use raw material; as to him it is not a representative of value. The standard legal-tender dollar, with less raw material in it, has been adopted by the Government, issued, put into the hands of the people in all the States; it regulates transactions among individuals, States, municipalities, and corporations over the whole country. It has its fixed value and its uses, and the greater the uses the greater the value. That is the accepted doctrine as I understand it; that is the fact, whatever may be the theory.

The object of passing the House bill is to give people something they can use, and not force them to hold something which we have destroyed for all the purposes money is needed for, which by law we have said shall no longer perform any of the functions of coin, and which our Secretary of the Treasury under the discretion given him allowed the mints to coin. Everybody knows that when Congress determined to resume specie payments on the 1st of January, 1879, the moment the Secretary of the Treasury, even in violation of law, said, "Although the law prohibits me from receiving the legal-tender notes of the country, the greenbacks as they are called, at the custom-houses, I will receive them for customs dues," they were taken, and there was never a dollar of gold called for to redeem them, because greenbacks, having even by executive order received that additional use, were at once as good as gold. Over $200,000,000 had to be paid every year in customs dues. The greenbacks had been long dishonored in the interest of the bondholders, and were, of course, at a discount because their use was limited. The moment that additional use was given to the legal-tender notes the difference between them and gold disappeared at once.

Mr. Hunter's report, from which I read a moment ago, shows that the bills of exchange issued by the Amsterdam merchants in the last century were worth more than gold because they would pay bills in Italy, in Austria, in France, in Holland, in England, and almost everywhere else, whereas the gold had to be transported at great cost, risk, and expense to those different countries. Therefore Amsterdam bills of exchange were always at a premium because of the additional use which could be made of them and the safety and convenience attending their use.

I repeat that it will not do to insist that the trade-dollar was not money, and therefore that we ought not to take it back and furnish a substitute for it after we have declared that it should no longer have the uses it had when we adopted it as a coin. There are but six or seven millions, according to the best estimates we can obtain, now in the hands of the people of this country. The other twenty-eight millions went abroad. The Director of the Mint advises us that he believes much of it has been melted up, but whether it has been or not it has been adopted in great part by China and other countries, and their brands, marks, and stamps have been put upon it, and it thus became theirs. I insist—I differ in that from other members of the committee—that we ought not to be called upon to take back a coin that China has stamped as her own, whether the change has been made by the government or the merchants of that country.

The committee had great difficulty in finding a trade-dollar with the Chinese stamp, but the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] obtained one somewhere; it was stamped all over with hieroglyphics so that nobody in this country would have a doubt but that it had been changed from what it was when it was issued from the Mint of the United States, and there would be no danger of our people being deceived in regard to that fact.

Returning to the old silver dollar and the treatment it received at the hands of Congress in 1873, and the persecution it has been subjected to ever since, attracted by what the Senator from Vermont said the other day, that it was by some inadvertence that the trade-dollar happened to be allowed to have any legal-tender quality in the coinage act of 1873, I hope that distinguished gentleman will tell us about that inadvertence, and I am glad the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], as he advised me a few moments ago, is going to argue this question when I sit down, which will be very soon. I want him to tell us what "inadvertence" it was that allowed to the trade-dollar the legal-tender quality given to it by the act of 1873.

If there was any "inadvertence" in that law it was in striking down and destroying the old standard legal-tender dollar of 412½ grains, which up to that day had been of equal legal-tender quality with gold from and before the adoption of the Constitution. We had been a silver-using country in all time.

The Senator from Vermont, while I think of it—for I have no particular order in speaking on these questions—seemed to think that it was a strong argument against silver coinage in any form that up to the time when the standard dollar was demonetized in 1873 only $8,445,838 of standard silver dollars had ever been coined in the United States; but he forgot to tell that we had half-dollars, quarter-dollars, 20-cent pieces, 10-cent pieces, and 5-cent pieces, and of them we had coined before 1853, if I mistake not, over one hundred million dollars' worth; they were of full legal value. We had coined of full dollars, it is true, only about eight millions and odd, but of half-dollars one hundred million dollars' worth, of quarter-dollars some $40,000,000, and of other small coins large amounts; making in all $184,280,941.40 in 1877. Upward of $100,000,000 of half-dollars had been coined before 1873; nearly $2,000,000 of standard dollars had been coined within fourteen months before the act of February, 1873, was passed. Up to the time that gold was discovered in California in 1849, we had more silver in the country than gold; I believe almost double as much, if the amount of Spanish milled dollars in circulation is taken into account.

It is difficult to tell how much silver we had, because we adopted the Spanish milled dollar; indeed it had been adopted by the several States long before the Constitution of the United States was adopted; and in 1793, in the first coinage act, while we allowed foreign coins of gold and silver to circulate under the regulation of Congress and to be accepted as a legal tender at the value so regulated, this provision was made by section 2 of the act of February 9, 1793:

That at the expiration of three years next ensuing the time when the coinage of gold and silver agreeably to the act entitled "An act establishing a mint, and regulating the coins of the United States," shall commence at the Mint of the United States, which time shall be announced by the proclamation of the President of the United States, all foreign gold coins and all foreign silver coins, except Spanish milled dollars and parts of such dollars, shall cease to be a legal tender, as aforesaid.

That act made another provision, that when foreign coins were received by the United States they should be recoined into the coin of the United States at the Mint, all except the Spanish milled dollar. That coin was retained and kept as part of our coinage; it was paid out at the Treasury and paid back into the Treasury and passed between man and man under the laws of the United States without change. Consequently our own coinage of silver dollars is apparently small, because we had adopted the Spanish milled dollar and did not require it to be recoined as we did other foreign coins, but kept it as part of our own coinage at full legal-tender value. The great mass of silver came from the Spanish countries at that time. The Senator from Delaware said in his speech, as he reminds me now, that at that time we were in fact a silver-using country, but we suffered no inconvenience from it. We had gone through the war of 1812; we had acquired Louisiana; we carried on the Mexican war, and by it acquired all the great States and Territories on the Pacific, while we relied on silver much more than we did on gold.

I do not care to refer to the various changes in our laws relative to foreign coins; they were regulated by Congress and were most of the time a legal tender at the rates fixed, but at all times the Spanish milled dollar was the favorite standard coin.

A great wrong was perpetrated by the act of 1873 in demonetizing silver, and the way it was done made the offense a grievous one. The Constitution of the United States declared that the States should make nothing but gold and silver coin a legal tender; that Congress shall alone have power to coin money. When it had coined money, when it had induced people to buy Spanish milled dollars and had placed them in the hands of the people, when the States, the municipalities, the corporations, private individuals, and the United States itself in its own obligations had contracted enormous debts upon the basis of the standard silver dollar, and when we had in regard to our own bonds said that they should be paid in gold or silver coin of the standard value of July, 1870, to strike down that coinage from the country, and say that silver should no longer be coined, should no longer be a legal tender for anything, was an unparalleled outrage, especially in a country like ours, growing as rapidly as we are, owing as we did six or seven or eight thousand million dollars in debts of the United States, of the States, of municipalities, of corporations, and of private individuals; yet the Senator from Vermont complains in the face of that action that somehow or other, by some "inadvertence," Congress happened to allow the trade-dollar to have a legal-tender quality of $5. I said I desired to know what that "inadvertence" consisted of. I aver here that there were not ten men in the lower House of Congress who knew at the time that the standard silver dollar was demonetized, that it was so stricken down. I have never seen or heard of one. The "inadvertence," when explained, may enlighten many of us. I was then a member of that body and would be glad to hear all about that transaction.

I have a very remarkable speech in my hand. I refer to a speech made by Hon. WILLIAM D. KELLEY, stating how little he and others knew about it. I call the attention of the Senator from Vermont to it. Perhaps he can tell where the "inadvertence" comes in. I would like to be informed, and I think the country would. Mr. KELLEY said:

In 1872, when I made the remarks which were cited by those gentlemen, and which have been frequently quoted in both Houses, and always with an air as much as to say that to convict this man of the crime of having been instructed by the logic of events would forever settle this momentous question, we were not using coin, and no gentleman in either House appears to have appreciated the scope and magnitude of the silver question or to have given it special study. Hence the bill—and I wish gentlemen to know what that bill was; it was a bill to reorganize the mints, not to revise the coin money of the country, but to reorganize the mints, and it was passed without allusion in debate to the question of the retention or abandonment of the standard silver dollar. The then Speaker of the House, now a distinguished member of the Senate, and Hon. Mr. VOORHEES, of Indiana, who is also a member of that body, were then members of this House, and during the last Congress this colloquy occurred between them. It was, I think, denied by Mr. VOORHEES that members of the House knew that the bill proposed to demonetize the silver dollar, and to sustain his view he said to the ex-Speaker: "Did you know it, sir?" "No," said Senator Blaine, "did you?" "No," replied Senator VOORHEES.

I was chairman of the committee that reported the original bill, and I aver on my honor that I did not know the fact that it proposed to drop the standard dollar, and did not learn that it had done it for eighteen months after the passage of the substitute offered by Mr. Hooper, when I disputed the fact. The distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Garfield] who now leads this side of the House was then as now an attentive and already a distinguished member of the House; yet when in joint debate before the people of Ohio in October, 1877, the question arose as to who was responsible for its demonetization, he frankly said he did not know that such a provision was in the bill when it passed the House. I state this the more freely in his absence because I informed him that I intended to do so; and he replied, "It is the case; I did make that statement, and it is true."

Nor did the President who signed the bill know that it abolished legal-tender standard silver dollars, for in his letter to Mr. Cowdrey of October 6, 1873, cited by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER], he said:

"Silver will gradually take the place of this currency, and, further, will become the standard of values, which will be hoarded in a small way. I estimate that this will consume from $200,000,000 to $300,000,000 in time of this species of our circulating medium. * * * I confess to a desire to see a limited hoarding of money. It insures a firm foundation in time of need. But I want to see the hoarding of something that has a standard value the world over. Silver has this."

More remarkable perhaps than that, when a debate arose in the House of Representatives fourteen months after that bill had passed in which the Senator from Vermont says by inadvertence the legal-tender quality to the extent of $5 was allowed to the trade-dollar—I suppose he means that they did not do the work as well as they thought they had done; they thought they had struck down silver in every form, but by inadvertence the trade-dollar happened to be allowed a five-dollar legal-tender quality; the law passed in February 1873, yet on the 14th day of April, 1874, fourteen months after, as the Senator from Vermont contends, all silver was supposed to be demonetized and stricken from the coinage and its legal-tender quality taken away except the inadvertence he speaks of—a debate sprang up in the House of Representatives growing out of what was known as the greenback controversy, whether we should retain the volume of greenbacks at $356,000,000 as they then were, or make the amount $400,000,000, which was finally compromised, I believe, at $378,000,000, and whether we should have free banking. Mr. E. Rockwood Hoar, a very distinguished gentleman who had been Attorney-General, and a very able one, by unanimous consent offered the following amendment to the bill:

That from and after the 4th day of July, in the year 1876, nothing but gold and silver coin of the United States shall be a legal tender for the payment of any debts thereafter contracted.

Do you think he had any suspicion that there was no silver coin of the United States then a legal tender for anything? Did he know any of the secrets of the act of February, 1873? No. The yeas and nays were called on Judge Hoar's proposition, and among those who voted for this amendment were Hon. HENRY L. DAWES, Hon. WILLIAM P. FRYE, James A. Garfield, EUGENE HALE, JOSEPH R. HAWLEY, GEORGE F. HOAR, and quite a number of other distinguished gentlemen. They evidently did not understand when the yeas and nays were called fourteen months after the passage of the act of 1873 that there was simply a five-dollar legal-tender quality to the trade-dollar, and that that was there by inadvertence. The inadvertence was all on the other side. These gentlemen did not know that silver coin had been stricken down. When that bill came to the Senate it was managed by the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], and the RECORD shows every form of expression used by him indicated that he did not know it. Among other things he said:

And in order to show this, wherever our silver coin shall float—and we are providing that it shall float all over the world—we propose to stamp upon it, instead of our eagle, which foreigners may not understand, and which they may not distinguish from a buzzard, or some other bird, the intrinsic fineness and weight of the coin. In this practical utilitarian age the officers of the Mint seemed to think it would be better to do that than to put the eagle on our silver coins. I must confess I do not think it is very important; but I think the Senator ought to be willing to defer in these matters to the practical knowledge of the officers who have charge of this branch of the Government service.

In all the debate the only controversy in the Senate was whether there should be a coinage charge. Mr. Casserly, a Senator from California, protested against it, and Mr. SHERMAN and others contended that we ought to have the right to charge enough to pay the expense of the coinage; but no suggestion was made anywhere by anybody that Congress proposed to strike silver from the coinage altogether, or that the five-dollar legal-tender quality that was ultimately given to the trade-dollar was by any inadvertence.

As I said, I do not propose to argue elaborately the policy of the provision of the fifth section of the committee's measure. I desire to content myself with showing now that we ought to retire the trade-dollar. The people took it believing it was good money and could be used as such. It had the sanction of the Government as one of its coins; men were punished for counterfeiting it; the amount of issue was under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury. No private man could tell what was the reason why he was allowing it to be issued; before 1876 $15,600,000 had been issued, $12,000,000 and more had been exported, three and a half millions was at home, and after the other $20,000,000 were coined the report of the Director of the Mint shows the following facts as to the coinage and export of trade-dollars:

For the month of—	Coined.	Exported.
November, 1877	400,000	487,177
December, 1877	589,060	531,301
January, 1878	1,391,300	381,237
February, 1878	1,525,200	101,761
March, 1878	1,308,200	131,250
April, 1878	35,000	290,835
May, 1878	200	85,306
Total	5,248,960	2,008,867

The coinage was $5,248,000, yet we only exported $2,008,000, leaving $3,400,000 to be scattered over the country and paid as I said to men who were working for wages to earn their daily bread, and this was going on under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MORRILL. Will it interrupt the Senator if I ask him to allow me to say a single word?

Mr. BECK. Certainly not.

Mr. MORRILL. As it is obvious to every one that the trade-dollar was solely intended for other parties, to be exported, the only thing I intended to convey by the word "inadvertence," which furnishes the Senator from Kentucky with so much music, was that it was wrong to allow a coin that was intended for export only to have any legal-tender quality whatever.

Mr. BECK. Then the Senator from Vermont intended that there should be no silver coinage that should have any legal-tender quality at all. Did he intend or avow that we should have gold, and gold alone, and exclude from our people one-half the coinage that then existed. In other words, did he intend to give the money that every creditor received from his debtor double the value that it had before, so that it would take twice the number of bushels of wheat, twice the number of acres of land, twice the number of cattle, horses, or anything a man had to pay the debts that his creditor held over him, thus doubling the burdens of the debtor class of the whole people, doubling the value of the money that the creditor was to have, and do all this by an act that was not known to the men that did it, and yet complain that there was some "inadvertence," that somebody blundered? It seems to be a source of regret that they did not do it absolutely and are sorry because they allowed the trade-dollar to have a five-dollar legal-tender quality. I ask the Senator from Vermont after the legal-tender quality was taken away from it what use was it to the men who held it? Why was it not retired at once? Did not fair dealing, did not common justice require that money issued by authority of the Government, coin of the United States coined upon precisely the same terms as gold, and given to men who brought the metal there just as gold coin was given to the men who brought gold, put it into their hands having a legal-tender quality that a man could not refuse to the extent of $5—and workers for wages seldom got more than that from one pay-day to another—require that the Government should honor it? To refuse to take it from them unless at a discount is an outrage that ought to be corrected, and that promptly.

In 1878 we restored the legal-tender quality of the 412½-grain dollar. We annulled the act of 1873. We were told then that gold would be driven out of the country in less than a year. There is nearly double as much gold in the country now as there was then. Silver has not driven gold out. That bill was vetoed by the President, it was passed over his veto in this body on a call of the yeas and nays by a vote of 46 to 16. Why turn against it now, it has performed its functions well from that day to this? I do not know what the discount on silver was then. I see by the reports it was almost as great, if not quite as great, as it is now, and it has never had fair play from any of the officials of the Government; it has been an illused step-child all the time.

Why should the coinage be stopped at this time? Whatever it may become necessary to do hereafter, why should we now strike it down? The bank circulation has decreased, as the Comptroller of the Currency says, last year twenty-five and a half millions, I think twenty-nine millions by this time. He has assured us that it will decrease every year $40,000,000 hereafter. There are only one hundred and ninety-three or one hundred and ninety-four millions of bonds outstanding now which can be paid before 1892, and they are payable now, on which say $135,000,000 of bank circulation is based. When these bonds are withrawn the banks are under no obligation to buy others or to continue to keep out their circulation. They can withdraw if they please, and if they do as they may why should we now be in hot haste to strike down the silver currency and the silver certificates that have done so well?

Let me refer for a moment to another fact before I take my seat. We passed a law when we rechartered the national banks on the 12th of July, 1882, in which we made this provision:

SEC. 12. That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to receive deposits of gold coin with the Treasurer or assistant treasurers of the United States, in sums not less than $20, and to issue certificates therefor in denominations of not less than $20 each, corresponding with the denominations of United States notes. The coin deposited for or representing the certificates of deposits shall be retained in the Treasury for the payment of the same on demand. Said certificates shall be receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues, and when so received may be reissued; and such certificates, as also silver certificates, when held by any national banking association, shall be counted as part of its lawful reserve; and no national banking association shall be a member of any clearing-house in which such certificates shall not be receivable in the settlement of clearing-house balances.

Yet to-day, in order to force us to strike down silver, these banks, in violation of that law, are combining with others, although they are prohibited by the very act granting them their charters from doing so, and are refusing to receive silver certificates, for the purpose, of course, of making them less valuable, the law of Congress to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. President, I do not care to argue this matter elaborately, indeed I do not care to do so at all, but when we do discuss it I think it will be shown to the satisfaction of the people of this country that the present condition is the result of an unlawful combination, organized in great part by men who are our fiscal agents, our creatures, living under our law, having only such authority as we see fit to give them, and yet they are publicly and openly defying our authority because they think it is their individual inferest to do so. They are endeavoring to drive silver and the silver certificates which we have provided for out of existence in order to bring gold to a premium, and thus embarrass the Government of this country. I do not know what is to be done by the new administration, but the difficulty that we have had all along in the past has been that our own agents have been allowed to violate the law. The banks have been allowed to violate it. They have certified checks when they had no money, time and again. No, body will venture to deny that. They are not authorized to charge a greater rate of interest than is allowed by the State in which they exist, and yet they have done it all the time.

The Comptroller of the Currency reports many cases, and says they have been warned and warned. All through his reports are warnings not to repeat those offenses, but nobody is punished. The law provides that gold and silver coin only shall be taken at the custom-house in payment of customs dues; and yet the greenback is taken by Treasury order, and the very men who ordered it to be taken illegally refused on a call of the yeas and nays in this Chamber to allow it to be legalized. They would rather operate against law and in violation of law and above law than act in accordance with it. The law provides that all the coin received at the custom-house—I have repeated that so often that I am almost ashamed to repeat it again—shall be set apart and applied first to pay the interest, and then to purchase 1 per cent. of the entire national debt as a sinking fund, and the balance only shall be paid into the Treasury.

The reports of our officials show, and the Senator from Vermont in his speech the other day showed, that they were receiving silver and silver certificates in large amounts at our custom-houses and refusing to pay them out as the law directs. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] said: "In six months, from July to December, 1883, inclusive, the receipts of customs at the port of New York in gold and gold certificates was $54,000,000, and the receipts for six months in 1884 in gold and gold certificates were $22,000,000, while the entire receipts at that port were three-fourths of the entire customs, $64,000,000, showing little more than one-third actually paid in gold or its equivalent."

Silver is by law the equivalent of gold, and is by law required to be paid out on the same terms; yet it is agreed by all that not one dollar received at the custom-house in silver coin or silver certificates has ever been paid for any such purpose as the law requires the customs receipts to be paid.

I do not know, as I said, what is going to happen hereafter, but I desire our coinage to remain as it is now until we see what does happen; whether men will be required to obey the law; whether they will be allowed to form syndicates or combinations or clearing-house arrangements in violation of their own charters; whether the next Secretary of the Treasury will dare to withhold silver and silver certificates received at the custom-house that he is required to use in payment of interest to the bondholders and in the purchase of bonds for the sinking fund.

I know what I think ought to be done. Whenever any bank forms an association of an illegal character and seeks to discredit the money, the gold or the silver or the certificates of this country, I would pay every dollar I could legally pay to them in silver and in silver certificates, and I would make them take the silver coin in payment of interest on their bonds, and I would redeem the bonds they held in silver and silver certificates, even if I had to take the gold that I received and pay it to banks and corporations that obeyed the law. I would discriminate as far as I could by aiding men and banks who obeyed the law, and I would do whatever the law allowed me to do to make those men who are defying our authority obey it and make it their interest to obey it by giving them the coin the Secretary is required to give them and which they are compelled to receive. I would make it their interest to make it good and thus put an end to the combinations they admit to-day they are illegally a part of.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to ask whether he thinks there is any further legislation necessary in order to protect the Government against these crimes which he says the banks have been committing?

Mr. BECK. With officers to enforce the law, with officials here to compel them to obey it, we have law enough; but there is no effort to punish them, and never has been anything but pretenses.

Mr. MORGAN. If I understand the statement made by the Senator from Kentucky, a member of the Committee on Finance, it is that the banks have deliberately violated the laws, the criminal laws, of the United States; that the Secretary of the Treasury reports those violations to Congress and to the Committee on Finance, and that instead of there having been any proceedings taken to punish the men who thus openly and flagrantly violate the law, a mere admonition is served upon them that hereafter they must do better than that or else they will be dealt with. Is that the situation?

Mr. BECK. That is the way I understand it substantially.

Mr. MORGAN. Last spring I received quite a rebuff in the Senate for having invited the Committee on Finance to look into this question and make a report upon it. The resolution that I had the honor to introduce was referred to that committee, and they sat down upon it. They have got it still in the committee, without having paid the slightest attention to it I believe; and now it turns out from the statement of a member of the Committee on Finance that all of those able Senators have been cognizant of the fact that these crimes have been committed; that the President of the United States has been cognizant of the fact that these crimes have been committed, and that they have not got the power to call these criminals to the bar of justice and punish them for the violation of the law.

I will further add, if the Senator from Kentucky will permit me, that there is no use of multiplying statutes merely to be dishonored by the Senate of the United States in its constant, persistent ignoring of crimes committed against law which they refuse to take any steps to insist shall be punished.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I said when I rose that I only meant to sustain the action of the committee in reporting the first three sections of this amended bill, and did not care to argue the other branch of the question. I am willing to wait. I am not alarmed by bank clearing-house combinations. Every dollar of every debt we owe can be paid in silver coin, and it is said our vaults are full of them. Every State, corporate, and private debt can be paid in silver. It will not be long before there will be a change of administration. I hope it will be an improvement on what we have had in the years gone by. Only one word more. Section 4 of the amended bill provides:

That the President is hereby authorized to renew negotiations with the States of the "Latin union," and with other foreign powers, for the purpose of making treaties with them in order to secure such co-operation as may enable the nations agreeing thereto to open their respective mints to the free coinage of silver, with full legal-tender power, at an agreed ratio to gold.

I do not think that there is any objection to that; I do not know that the House will object to it. I am willing so far as I am concerned to give the sanction of Congress to any honest effort that any Executive may make in dealing with other nations to endeavor to utilize our silver and in keeping up our coinage of it. We are producing in the United States 40 per cent. of all the silver that is produced in the world. The gold product of the world has fallen from $152,000,000 a year a few years ago down to $94,000,000. The Director of the Mint shows that four countries, the United States, England, France, and Germany, are using fifty-two millions per annum of the ninety-four millions produced in the world in ornamentation, jewelry, and other things for which gold can be used; he shows that gold is diminishing in quantity and thereby increasing in value; that our silver is not increasing in quantity, but has somewhat diminished, but holding its own better in proportion than gold has done, while trade and business is rapidly developing everywhere, and silver will buy more of anything but gold than it ever would. We know that France is maintaining a far larger proportion of silver to gold than we are maintaining to-day—five hundred millions of silver against six hundred millions of gold, and her silver is worth 12½ grains less to the dollar than ours.

Mexico, Central America, South America, China, Japan, the Indies, all the countries with whom we shall ever have any sale in the future for our manufactures, are silver-using countries; and if the President can make any arrangement whereby England will no longer dominate the coinage of the world, and the trade of the world, and the bills of exchange of the world, as she is doing now through her 60 per cent. of its carrying trade and commerce—she, of course, wants gold and gold alone—I hope we will if we can, aid the President in making an earnest effort to get the other countries to agree with us in maintaining a silver standard equal with gold. I am very anxious to see that done; but I am not willing, in advance, to vote for the section which provides that if we fail to do what we desire we will quit coining silver on a given day within sixteen months of this time. I regard that as equivalent to saying in advance to England or Germany, "If you great creditor countries can prevent other countries from uniting with the United States for twelve or fifteen months, then we have a contract already by an act of Congress that the United States will make no further effort to maintain silver coinage; then they will be at your mercy and at the mercy of the creditor class at home, your allies." I will not say that as the last section of the committee bill proposes to do.

England with her diplomacy and power will prevent all agreements if we pass that section. Germany, though I think she is not as anxious to maintain gold alone as she was after she obtained a thousand millions in gold from France, has an object in view. England draws coin from every quarter. Her reports show over ten thousand ports in the world to which her ships trade; she has her agents gathering in business and cargoes everywhere. She is now drawing from us $100,000,000 for doing our ocean-carrying. All bills of exchange have to be drawn on London. Her bankers get the profit. She is to-day storing the goods of the world in her great warehouses and selling the silver that she obtains from us to her serfs in India, while her own people at home are drawing in the gold of the world. I am not willing to say in advance to her that if she can defeat any efforts made by us to restore our silver coinage we will surrender to her. That is what is proposed by the fifth section of the bill. But I must close. I said to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] I would not consume over three-quarters of an hour. I have exceeded my time and I will now yield the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN obtained the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from Ohio yield to me?

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] desires to call up an appropriation bill. I will yield to that.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Ohio to yield to me in order that I may at this time present to the Senate the pension appropriation bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection, having the floor on this question, when the bill comes up again. I suppose the bill ought to be laid aside informally.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire that the bill be laid aside informally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That course will be taken if there be no objection.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 6th instant, approved and signed the act (S. 1242) to reimburse Elizabeth Comstock customs dues paid by her on articles donated for the relief of colored emigrants; and, on the 9th instant, the joint resolution (S. R. 104) providing for the printing and distribution of the Descriptive Catalogue of Government Publications.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 7551) admitting free of duty an altar and church regalia for the Catholic church at Carrolltown, Pa., was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that House bill 7785, being the pension appropriation bill, may be taken up at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7785) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the bill may be read for amendment, and that the first or formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the formal reading of the bill will be dispensed with, and the reading for amendment will proceed. The Chair hears no objection.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was, in section 1, line 30, after the word "pensions," to insert "who shall have served at least three months after date of muster;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That all applicants for pensions who shall have served at least three months after date of muster shall be presumed to have had no disability at the time of enlistment; but such presumption may be rebutted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 34, before the word "agents," to strike out "twelve" and insert "eighteen;" and in line 35, after the word "each," to strike out "forty-eight" and insert "seventy-two;" so as to read:

For the salaries of eighteen agents for the payment of pensions, at $1,000 each, $72,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, after the word "dollars," in line 36, to strike out the following clause:

And from and after July 1, 1885, there shall be no more than twelve agents for the payment of pensions, and it shall be the duty of the President, and he is hereby authorized and directed, to reduce the pension agents to not exceeding the number aforesaid; and so much of sections 4778 and 4780 as is in conflict with this provision be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 44, after the word "lights," to strike out "and;" in line 46, after the word "pensioners," to insert "stationery, and other necessary expenses, to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior;" and before "thousand," in line 48, to strike out "fifty-three" and insert "fifty-six;" so as to read:

For fees for preparing vouchers, rent, fuel lights, postage on letters to the Executive Departments and to pensioners, stationery, and other necessary expenses, to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, $256,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 48, after the word "after," to strike out "March 4" and insert "June 30;" and after the word "available," at the end of line 55, to strike out:

And hereafter the mode and manner provided by law and regulations for the payment of white persons entitled to pensions shall apply to and govern the payment of all pensioners.

So as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That from and after June 30, 1885, the salary and emoluments of agents for the payment of pensions shall be $4,000, and no more, per annum; and of the fees provided by law for vouchers prepared and paid, only so much thereof as may be required for expenses incurred in having said vouchers prepared, as well as the necessary clerical work at the agencies, shall be available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 59 and 60, as follows:

For contingent expenses of pension agencies, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out, from section 2 to section 10, inclusive, as follows:

SEC. 2. That no agent, attorney, or other person shall demand or receive any fee for his services in pension, arrears of pension, or bounty-land claims until the allowance of the claim.

SEC. 3. That all fees in pension claims shall be paid by the agent for paying pensions out of the first installment of pension due the claimant; and no agent, attorney, or other person shall receive any fee for his services in a pension claim except through the agent for paying pensions.

SEC. 4. That the fee in all pension, arrears of pension, or bounty-land claims shall be $10, except in cases of special written contract, filed in the Pension Office and approved by the Commissioner of Pensions, as hereinafter provided. The claimant may contract with his attorney of record, in writing, in such form as the Commissioner of Pensions may prescribe, for a fee to an amount not exceeding $25, except in claims for increase of pension where no new disability is alleged, in cases of pensions for service, and in all claims filed in the Pension Office after June 28, 1878, and prior to the 4th day of July, 1884, in which cases no fee above $10 shall be contracted for; and in all claims filed prior to the passage of this act the attorney shall file a statement, under oath, duly attested, setting forth the amount of fee already received by him, and the amount already received shall be deducted from the fee allowed by this act.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe rules and regulations governing the recognition of agents, attorneys, or other persons representing claimants before his Department, and may require of such persons, agents, and attorneys, before being recognized as representatives of claimants, that they shall show that they are of good moral character and in good repute, possessed of the necessary qualifications to enable them to render such claimants valuable service and otherwise competent to advise and assist such claimants in the presentation of their cases; and such Secretary may suspend, debar, dismiss, and disbar from further practice before his Department any such person, agent, or attorney shown to be incompetent, disreputable, or who refuses to abide by the said rules and regulations, or who shall in any manner deceive, mislead, or threaten any claimant or presumptive claimant by word, circular, letter, or by advertisement.

SEC. 6. That any agent or attorney or other person instrumental in prosecuting any claim for pension, or arrears thereof, who shall directly or indirectly contract for, demand, or receive and retain any compensation for his services or instrumentality for prosecuting a claim for pension, or arrears thereof, greater than is herein provided, or in any other manner than herein provided, or shall wilfully or knowingly make a false statement in regard to the amount of fee already received, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall for every such offense be fined not exceeding $1,000, or be confined at hard labor not exceeding two years, or both, at the discretion of the court, and be forever afterward debarred from practicing before the Pension Office.

SEC. 7. That no agent or attorney shall either demand or receive, on account of the prosecution of any claim provided for under the provisions of this act, where such claim was filed after the 28th day of June, 1878, and prior to the 4th day of July, 1884, any fee or sum of money in excess of $10; nor shall said $10, or any part thereof, be paid to any agent or attorney until he make and file in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions the affidavit provided for in section 4 of this act; and if it shall appear from said affidavit, or in any other way, that all or any part of said $10 has been paid, it shall be deducted therefrom, and the residue, if any, shall be paid to such attorney as hereinbefore provided: Provided, That this act shall not be so construed as to interfere with any contracts, entered into fairly and without fraud or duress, for the prosecution of claims filed after the 4th day of July, 1884, and prior to the passage of this act; and that any person who shall violate the provisions of this act shall be, upon conviction, punished as provided in the sixth section of this act.

SEC. 8. That this act shall not be so construed as to prohibit any claimant the prosecution of whose claim has been heretofore abandoned by his attorney from employing another attorney or agent, but in no such case shall the fee paid such attorney exceed the sum of $10, under the penalties of the sixth section of this act: Provided, That if such new attorney successfully prosecute such claim, that the original attorney or agent shall not be allowed to demand or receive any part thereof, under the penalties of the sixth section of this act.

SEC. 9. That hereafter no person or persons who may have been heretofore engaged in the prosecution of pension or bounty land-claims of any character whatsoever, and who may have heretofore collected on account thereof any sum whatever, shall be allowed to sell, assign, convey, or make over to any other person any such claim or claims, so as that it shall be lawful for any vendee or assignee of such claim or claims to demand or receive any other or greater fee than is hereinbefore provided for; nor shall such vendee or assignee be allowed to receive anything therefor until the vendor or assignor of such claim or claims, if alive, shall make and file in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions the affidavit provided for in the fourth section of this act; and any person or persons who shall violate the provisions of this section shall be subject to the penalties imposed by the sixth section of this act: Provided, That the provisions of this act authorizing contracts for a fee of $25 shall be limited to attorneys or agents residing in the State where the claimant resides, and shall not extend to agents or attorneys in the District of Columbia; and it shall be unlawful for any agent or attorney residing in a State of which the claimant is resident to enter into partnership with or otherwise to divide the fee of $25 with any attorney or agent residing in the District of Columbia.

SEC. 10. That all the provisions of the act making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, approved July 4, 1884, relating to claim agents and attorneys in pension cases, are hereby repealed: Provided, That as to offenses committed under said act all the provisions thereof shall remain in full force.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. All the portion that embraces general legislation is, in accordance with the recommendation of the committee, stricken out?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). From and including section 2 to the end of the bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the provision in relation to the presumption of soundness in the proviso at the end of the clause on page 2:

Provided, That all applicants for pensions who shall have served at least three months after date of muster shall be presumed to have had no disability at the time of enlistment; but such presumption may be rebutted.

On Saturday the Senate adopted an amendment to the bill for the relief of Mrs. Sarah B. Jackson on that subject which reads as follows:

That in all applications under the general pension laws, including this act, where it appears by record evidence that the applicant was regularly enlisted and mustered into the service, that fact shall be prima facie evidence of soundness at the time of his enlistment; but such presumption shall be subject to rebuttal by record or other competent evidence.

There is a conflict between these two provisions.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest to the Senator that when the bill comes into the Senate he can ask for a separate vote on that amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL. Very well.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. How shall the question be taken on the amendments?

Mr. ALLISON. At the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, I ask for a separate vote on the amendment found on page 2, section 1, lines 30 and 31.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A separate vote will be reserved upon that amendment, and the question will be put on concurring in the other amendments.

The question being put, it was declared that the affirmative appeared to prevail.

Mr. INGALLS. Is the question now on striking out the general legislation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It includes all the amendments except the one on the second page at lines 30 and 31.

Mr. INGALLS. I will ask for a division of the Senate upon the question of agreeing to the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole—that is, on the proposition to strike out the general legislation in this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa asked for a separate vote as to agreeing to the amendment on page 2, in lines 30 and 31, and the question was put on agreeing to all the other amendments in gross.

Mr. ALLISON. Of course, if the Senator from Kansas desires a separate vote, I shall not object to it. I think the Senate ought to understand exactly what is proposed in striking out the legislation found on page 4 and the following pages.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas ask for a separate vote upon any other amendment than the one reserved by the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Iowa reserved, I understand, the amendment on page 2, lines 30 and 31.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes.

Mr. INGALLS. What I desire to obtain is a vote of the Senate upon the amendment striking out the general legislation from this bill. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to ask him, are those words upon page 3, lines 36 to 43, recommended to be stricken out because they are general legislation?

Mr. ALLISON. They are recommended to be stricken out for a double reason; first that they are general legislation, and secondly because we do not think it is a wise thing to reduce the number of agents from eighteen to twelve.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations where the new legislation commences. It does not seem to be that which is erased simply, but it certainly includes some other provisions, because in the thirtieth line in the proviso there is language in Italics which the committee have reported to insert which is an amendment of other new legislation.

Mr. ALLISON. A separate vote has been asked on that, and I suppose it will be voted out.

Mr. BLAIR. The committee has reported the rejection of some of the new legislation, and has not reported the rejection of others, as would appear from the form of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As there seems to have been some misunderstanding, the Chair will inquire again whether any Senator desires a separate vote upon any amendment other than the one which was asked for by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir; I have just stated that I desire to obtain the sense of the Senate on the question of striking out the general legislation, beginning on page 4, as recommended by the committee.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to inquire whether the motion of the Senator from Kansas is designed to include all the new general legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was about to suggest to the Senator from Kansas that he should specify the amendment upon which he desired a separate vote. The Chair understands that he only asks for a separate vote on the striking out of the sections commencing on page 4. The Chair will put the question——

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. What is the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the question to be this, whether the Senate will concur in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, striking out all of the bill commencing on page 4, section 2, to the end.

Mr. BLAIR. Now, Mr. President, I wish to understand where we are. This comes here under the broad general statement of a principle of action adopted by the Appropriations Committee, as I understand—I may be wrong, and I should like to be set right if I am wrong—that they will, under the rules of the Senate and the supposed instruction of the Senate, reject all general legislation sent to the Senate from the House upon an appropriation bill, and therefore they have reported in favor of striking out certain portions of this bill; and those portions which they recommend to be stricken out, in the application of this principle, are designated by a line drawn through them by way of erasure. It seems to me, and I suppose it to be so from other portions of the bill, that they have reported favorably and have amended themselves other general legislation coming to us from the House upon this same bill. I very likely am wrong; I shall be glad to be set right if I am wrong. I will call a point to the Senator's attention. Take the second page, line 29, where the proviso commences:

Provided, That all applicants for pensions who shall have served at least three months after date of muster shall be presumed to have had no disability at the time of enlistment; but such presumption may be rebutted.

Is not that general and new legislation?

Mr. ALLISON. It is.

Mr. BLAIR. There is no such law at the present time. That is not erased.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator will pardon me a moment. The committee have also reported an amendment to that provision of general legislation coming from the House in the bill.

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly; so that the committee seem to have adopted the instruction of the Senate where it pleased them and to have rejected it where in their judgment it was unwise to follow the admonition of the Senate. Undoubtedly it is all right, but it ought not to be understood by the Senate that the committee comes here rejecting certain legislation, because it is general legislation, thereby standing by the instruction of the Senate and the principle prohibited in our rules, when as part of the same bill, in the same bill, they report favorably other general legislation and amend the same which may commend itself to their judgment.

Mr. JACKSON. I understand that the new legislation that is proposed to be stricken out by the committee is substantially the same as the bill that the Senate passed the other day.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAIR. It may be all right to strike that out, and undoubtedly it ought to be stricken out. I only call attention to the fact that there is other legislation on this same bill coming from the House which the Appropriations Committee reports favorably along with amendments to the same.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment has not yet been acted upon.

Mr. INGALLS. Is that the amendment I indicated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is on page 2, line 30. It has not yet been acted on.

Mr. INGALLS. Is it now subject to the point of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks that it is.

Mr. INGALLS. Then I make the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks it will be subject to the point of order when it comes before the Senate. It is not now before the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. I understood it was all now before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks it is not. The Chair thinks the question now before the Senate is on concurring in the amendment of the Committee of the Whole striking out from section 2 to section 10, both inclusive.

Mr. INGALLS. The bill has been reported to the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been.

Mr. INGALLS. Then I raise the point of order on the amendment reported by the committee in lines 30 and 31 that it is general legislation on an appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will consider that point of order after having disposed of the question now before the Senate. The question before the Senate——

Mr. INGALLS. I will relieve the Chair from any embarrassment by reserving a separate vote on each of the amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Perhaps it would be more in order, then, that the Senate should take them as they occur in the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. In their order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, that order will be pursued. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole in lines 30 and 31, on page 2, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. After the word "pensions," in line 30 of section 1, the Committee of the Whole inserted, "who shall have served at least three months after date of muster."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Kansas raises the point of order.

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That this is an amendment in the nature of general legislation? The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. INGALLS. Although the Chair is right, for the purpose of settling this question by vote of the Senate I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas appeals from the decision of the Chair sustaining the point of order.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the President state the question? I do not understand it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate was upon concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole on page 2, lines 30 and 31; and the Senator from Kansas made the point of order that the amendment proposed was an amendment in the nature of general legislation. The Chair sustained that point of order, from which decision the Senator from Kansas has taken an appeal.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to understand from the Chair the ground he takes in reference to this legislation. This is legislation attached to a legislative provision which was inserted in the House. Am I to understand the Chair to decide that although a legislative provision appears in the bill as it comes from the House, it is not competent for the Senate to amend that legislation? In other words, shall I understand the decision of the Chair to mean that we must take whatever House legislation comes in these bills as a whole, without amendment, not having the power or the privilege in this body of amending a legislative provision found on the bill as it comes here? That is, as I understand, the ruling of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If it were an original question it is possible the Chair might have decided differently, but the Chair understands that the ruling now made is in accordance with former rulings made by the regular presiding officer of the body; and in holding that this amendment was not in order the Chair supposed he was following what has been laid down as the rule of the Senate. If the Chair is in error in that respect he would be very glad to be corrected; but the Chair so understands the ruling of the Senate, and proposes to follow it without expressing any individual opinion on the point.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I do not think this precise point has been ruled upon by the present President pro tempore of the Senate. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] asks that the precise point involved in this appeal may be stated to the Senate. I will state it.

House bill 7785, being the bill making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes, is under consideration. This bill, in section 1, contains general legislation sent here by the House of Representatives. The Senate Committee on Appropriations have reported an amendment to the general legislation contained in the bill as it comes from the House of Representatives. It has hitherto been held that legislation on appropriation bills coming from the House of Representatives was not open to amendment in the Senate.

I have raised the point of order upon the amendment in lines 30 and 31 of the first section of the bill, that it was not admissible under the rules of the Senate, being general legislation on an appropriation bill. The Chair held, in accordance with previous rulings, that the point of order was well taken and that the amendment should be stricken from the bill. From that decision I have appealed for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the Senate whether or not the spirit of our rule that forbids us to put general legislation upon appropriation bills prevents us from amending general legislation that comes from the House of Representatives on such bills. I believe that the rule in its spirit does not prevent us from amending such legislation. I think the decision of the Chair has hitherto been improvidently made; I think the decision was wrong; and I want the Senate by its vote to declare a precedent that will enable us hereafter to offer amendments to general legislation coming on appropriation bills from the House of Representatives if we are forbidden by our own rules from offering amendments in the nature of general legislation ourselves.

Mr. DAWES. I hope that the decision of the Chair will not be sustained, although I agree with the occupant of the chair that the precedents require that ruling by him. I always believed that it was erroneous, and it has led to much trouble. The amendment is not a proposition to amend existing legislation, but to amend proposed legislation. It is proposed legislation which is in order. It is in order because it came here from the other branch.

The proposed legislation is in order. You can not strike that out except by a vote. The idea that to offer an amendment to proposed independent legislation is to propose itself independent legislation I never could understand. The consequence of it has been such that we ought, in the shortest possible way, without reflecting upon any occupant of the chair, to put a construction upon that rule which has some sense in it, I hope I may be permitted to say. The idea that we can not amend proposed legislation because we can not introduce independent legislation, is like saying that we can not propose an amendment to an appropriation bill because we can not introduce an appropriation bill here. I do not think it is right and sound; and the effect of it has been such as to bring its impropriety so prominently before the Senate that I am very glad the Senator from Kansas has taken this appeal from the decision of the Chair, and I hope we shall not omit this opportunity to make the rule what I supposed it was.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator state, if it has not been already stated in the debate, how long a time back the ruling that the Senate can not in any way deal with and amend propositions from the House embodying general legislation has been the parliamentary law of this body?

Mr. DAWES. Other Senators could tell more definitely than myself. When the President pro tempore preceding the present President pro tempore was occupying the chair, I should think some four years ago, I heard it announced for the first time as a ruling. It took me, and I supposed, from the remarks that were made in the discussion, it took the whole Senate by surprise as a new ruling. Up to the time of the ruling by the President pro tempore who immediately preceded the present President pro tempore of the Senate I had never heard of such a construction upon the rule; but still my memory is not conclusive.

Mr. HALE. Was it not the actual fact that up to that time it was the common practice for the Senate to deal with House provisions embodying legislation upon appropriation bills by amending them, by modifying them, by changing them according to the will of the Senate, without any point of order being raised?

Mr. DAWES. That is my memory in reference to the decision here, though I would not speak with any great confidence.

Mr. HALE. That was before my service in the body, but my recollection is that that was the course of procedure in the Senate up to within a comparatively brief space of time.

Mr. DAWES. Before my service in the Senate, if my memory serves me right, there was a rule in the Senate which allowed independent legislation on appropriation bills, while there was one in the House which absolutely forbade it. I know the habit of members of the House was, whenever they failed to get an amendment into an appropriation bill on that ground, to come to this body and get it inserted here. I remember one very distinct case, a very important civil-service law, that we had until this last one, was a provision which had been tried two or three times upon an appropriation bill in the other branch; and at my suggestion the author of it came over here and it was sent down to the House in an appropriation bill from this body.

As I understand, this change in our rules has gone further, and the Senate till a recent period permitted some sort of independent legislation and the House excluded it. The House has gone the other way, and the Senate has receded to the extent that it has voluntarily, by a construction which seems to me to be wrong, tied its own hands and said to the House, "We will take or reject, but will not amend, anything you send over."

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me, before he sits down, to ask a question? The proposed amendment in lines 30 and 31 is undoubtedly germane, but suppose an amendment were proposed not germane to the matter, for instance, putting in a whole pension bill, would the Senator still be of opinion that it should be received?

Mr. DAWES. Putting new matter in?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Under our rule it is not essential that an amendment shall be germane. We can propose an amendment entirely changing the original bill.

Mr. DAWES. I do not think that an independent amendment, an amendment having no pertinency to and not germane to the measure, would be in order. It seems to me it is not independent legislation to propose to amend in any way that is germane to the subject-matter before the Senate. It was a good while before I could learn that it was no objection to an amendment in this body that it was not germane to the subject-matter. That was so strange a parliamentary rule that it was a good while before I could learn to govern myself accordingly.

Mr. PLATT. If the Senator from Massachusetts will permit me, there is nothing in the rule I think which requires that an amendment proposed shall be germane to the particular matter of legislation which appears in the bill to which the amendment is moved. If an amendment is not germane or relevant to the subject-matter contained in the bill it can not be received. But to illustrate: Suppose that we may amend legislation which comes from the House, taking this very legislation which comes from the House, if an amendment is in order, why may we not take section 2 to section 10 and substitute them for this legislation which has come from the House to which really they have no particular relevancy?

Mr. DAWES. I would so administer the parliamentary law of this body, until I was required to administer it some other way, that matter not germane should not be in order; that matter having no reference to the independent legislation that has come here in order should not under the guise of amendments to it be ruled in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair begs leave to state, although the matter has been decided and is now pending on appeal, if the Senate will pardon him, that this precise question as it now appears on raising the point of order upon an amendment to legislation which comes in a House bill has been presented to the Senate several times within the recollection of the present occupant of the chair.

The present occupant of the chair recollects that in the time of Mr. Colfax, Vice-President of the United States, in the time of Mr. Wheeler, Vice-President of the United States, and in the time of Senator Davis, President pro tempore, not always by the Senator who now occupies the chair decisions have been made (sometimes by the Senator who now occupies the chair) upon distinct amendments proposed to legislation that appeared in a House appropriation bill coming from the House; and the recollection of the Chair is that all these presiding officers held that such an amendment was not in order, upon the ground that the rules of the Senate made no distinction as to the part of the bill at which the proposed amendment by a Senator or by a committee might come in. That ruling was always acquiesced in or sustained. The Chair does not remember any case of an appeal.

So the Chair thinks it clear that the history for a good many years, going back to the time of Mr. Colfax, of the action of the Senate has been such as would sustain the ruling of the Senator from Connecticut who occupied the chair when this question arose. The provision of the rule is that—

> No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill, nor shall any amendment not germane or relevant to the subject-matter contained in the bill be received.

The effect of holding that this particular amendment reported from the Committee on Appropriations is in order would be that it would be in order to propose any other amendment to this legislation that is germane to the bill—that is, germane to the subject of providing the means of carrying on the payment of pensions. It seems clear to the Chair, this amendment being held to be in order, that if some Senator should rise and propose an addition to this legislation and as a continuation of it some other provision that should seem to be useful to the Senator on the subject of administering the pension laws, it would be germane to the bill, as much so as the amendment that is now pending, which is certainly germane to the bill. It relates to the subject that the bill has under consideration. No point of order could be made upon this amendment on the ground that it is not germane. The result would be that any legislation which touched the Pension Office and the payment of pensions would be germane to the bill. If an amendment to the House legislation is in order on the ground that it does not fall within the condemnation of the other part of the rule, then any legislation that is proposed in this bill to the House legislation, although not germane to that particular point, but still germane to the subject of a pension appropriation bill, would be in order, and the result would be that the whole subject of legislating about pensions would be open.

Mr. HALE. Will the Chair excuse me for asking a question here? What would be the construction the Chair would place upon the next clause in the rule? It reads—

> Nor shall any amendment to any item or clause of such bill be received which does not directly relate thereto.

Is the force of the word "thereto" to be made applicable to the "item or clause of such bill," or to the bill in general? It seems to me that if it is applicable to the "item or clause," you thereby get a limitation which prevents general sweeping legislation coming in relating to the whole subject of the bill. I make the inquiry because I desire to be enlightened.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the point precisely, and can state in reply that that subject has undergone a constant practice in the Senate for a great many years, the construction of that clause in the rule having always been that it relates to items of appropriation and clauses of appropriation, and not to the question of general legislation which has been exhausted and provided for in the previous provision; so that if there were an item to pay so much for pension clerks you could not add to that item a provision for paying special agents, or whatever it might be, that did not relate to the question of pension clerks. It relates to appropriation items as distinguished from legislation. That the Chair thinks has always been the practice of the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. Speaking historically, I think the Chair has probably fallen into an error in the statement that the interpretation of the rule to which he alludes had been given to it by Mr. Colfax among others. Since this subject was previously under discussion I have examined the history of this rule, and I find that the first inhibition in the rules of the Senate against general legislation upon an appropriation bill appeared in 1876 in the revision that was made under the leadership of the then Senator from Michigan, at one time President pro tempore of the Senate, Hon. T. W. Ferry. Inasmuch as Mr. Colfax disappeared from public life in 1873, the memory of the Chair I think would hardly be borne out by the statistics. But that of course is immaterial. I merely allude to that fact because it was stated somewhere within my hearing not long since that there had been a prohibition forbidding general legislation on appropriation bills as far back as 1837.

That is absolutely incorrect. There has been no such rule even in the House of Representatives until within ten years last past, and even there it is not in words a prohibition of general legislation, but a statement that no amendment shall be received to change existing law, which is of course tantamount to the same thing. But so far as the history of parliamentary procedure in the Senate is concerned, the prohibition first appeared in our rules in 1876–'77. Whether the interpretation has been such as the President pro tempore states since then, of course I am not fully advised, but with regard to every other interpretation of our rules I think I am correct in saying that it has been upon whichever side of the rule a majority of the Senate seemed inclined to favor. There can be found upon all these disputed points decisions on one side and decisions on the other.

Now, about the ruling that is at present before us, I think that the Senator from Connecticut then occupying the chair was entirely correct in ruling as he did, that the amendment proposed by the committee to the bill as it came from the House was not in order under our rules as they had been previously interpreted, but I think the interpretation was improvidently made; it is one which I think is not within the spirit of the rule; and I desire to present as broadly and as distinctly as is possible, by an appeal from that ruling, the question whether we shall be permitted to propose amendments to general legislation upon appropriation bills propounded by the House, because if we are not to do it then we have one simple alternative, either to reject all such legislation under our rule, which does not apply to legislation coming from the House of Representatives, or to accept such legislation exactly as the House proposes it to us.

I should like to make a further parliamentary inquiry, because this question is one of very great interest; it is one of great moment. If a committee of conference submit a report amending general legislation upon an appropriation bill, is that open to a point of order under the rules of the Senate; or has a committee of conference a right to violate those rules and bring in general legislation here to which we are compelled to submit without amendment? I ask that as a parliamentary question of the Chair in order that we may have a full view of all the exigencies that confront us.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of course the Senator from Kansas, with his familiarity with parliamentary law, will perfectly understand that the question would be premature, and the Chair could not, fully performing his strict duty, be called upon to make any reply.

Mr. INGALLS. I understood that, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But the present occupant of the chair will state to the Senator from Kansas that it is clear to the present occupant of the chair that no conferees on the part of the Senate (we have nothing to do with those of the House) can have any right to recommend anything that would violate the rules of the Senate, whatever it might be, on appropriation bills or anything else; and that a point of order made upon a report of Senate conferees on any bill that what they had reported contravened the rules would necessarily be sustained if it turned out that it did contravene the rules.

Mr. INGALLS. That is, if the Senate conferees should submit a report here in which it appeared that an amendment had been made to general legislation upon an appropriation bill coming from the House, that would be open to a point of order under the Senate rules?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. HALE. Now, Mr. President, let us understand this. Under that intimation from the Chair, if the House of Representatives under its rules, which are the law of that body, incorporates upon an appropriation bill features of general legislation which the rules of the Senate would forbid this body to put on, but which the House can put on, and the bill is sent here and the Senate strikes out that legislation, and the bill is returned to the House with the House legislation stricken out, and conferees are appointed by the two bodies, if then the Senate conferees report that they have at last in conference assented to the House proposition and report the bill back to this body with the legislation put on by the House left upon the bill, is it the intimation of the Chair that a point of order would then be good and would be sustained on the report of the conference committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That has not been the intimation of the Chair. That is a different question, leaving the bill precisely with what the House had in it. But if the Senate conferees should report any provision in a bill which if moved by a committee of this body or by any Senator in it would be out of order, it would be still out of order if reported by the conferees.

Mr. HALE. But if the Senate conferees report that they have assented to the legislation which the House put on, which the Senate could not, under its rules, put on, would that be subject to a point of order on the conference report?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is quite a different question.

Mr. HALE. I do not understand the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That would be merely a recommendation by the Senate conferees, because the Senate conferees have nothing else to substitute. It would be merely a recommendation that the Senate recede from its disagreement to the proposition of the House.

Mr. HALE. Then we may not understand that there is any intimation that a point of order would lie in the case I have stated?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no such intimation from the Chair.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to inquire if there is any precedent for the idea that when independent legislation is submitted to a committee of conference of the two bodies, it can not be modified?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can not state. The Chair can only say that it is the duty of the Chair to enforce the law of the Senate as laid down to him in the rules; and when the rules provide that no amendment shall be received to an appropriation bill which is legislative in its character, and the Senate and the Chair hold that an amendment is legislative in its character, the Chair is of opinion (speaking in advance of such a question being raised and of course having the right to change his opinion upon consideration; it is merely an intimation) that the conferees of the Senate, the agents of the Senate, in conferring with the House, have no more power to agree to violate the rules of the Senate than any committee of the Senate or any Senator would have. That is all the Chair now says.

Mr. DAWES. Could the Chair indicate what would be the use of submitting such a proposition to a committee of conference if it could not be modified?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it can.

Mr. DAWES. The Chair thinks it can be modified?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks he can intimate what would be the use of it. In persuading the House of Representatives——

Mr. DAWES. If the Chair will allow me, I do not see what else the committee of conference could confer about except whether they would take the legislation as the House dictates it. I do not think anybody would want to go on such a committee of conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not of opinion that the House dictates any legislation to the Senate or the Senate to the House. The Chair is of opinion, speaking in advance of all such questions, that there might be a use in conference in attempting to persuade the House of Representatives that any legislation upon an appropriation bill was vicious and that the Senate could not consent to it.

Mr. DAWES. If the Chair will bear with me (because I am sometimes on committees of conference, and I am at sea just now), am I to understand that the Senate conferees could go to this extent, that they might persuade the House conferees to modify their proposition, but that they could not suggest any modification of their own? Is that the understanding of the Chair?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the understanding of the Chair, beginning with the fundamental principle which the Chair believes in, that the agents of the Senate have no greater power in conference than any committee of the Senate would have in a proceeding within its walls, and that therefore when the agents of the Senate conferring with the House propose that the Senate shall violate its own rules by introducing matter which the rules forbid, the fact that they are called upon to reach an agreement gives them no different status from that which a standing or select committee would have.

Mr. DAWES. If the rules of the Senate require that when a committee of conference is appointed on the part of the Senate over some independent legislation that gets into conference, the Senate conferees are limited to the effort to persuade the House conferees to modify it, and they can not themselves suggest any modification, the Chair will permit me to remark that it is highly instructive, to say the least.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the simple question is this, if the Chair may be allowed to say it here, instead of on the floor. If the Senate of the United States is unwilling that legislation shall go on appropriation bills, it is only necessary to say so to the House of Representatives. Neither House ever undertakes to dictate to the other, and whatever one House proposes to the other must be agreed to by the other House before it can become operative. If therefore the Senate of the United States speaking through its conferees says to the House of Representatives, "We can not consent to this bill, this clause, or phrase, or section, or series of sections in it," if the House of Representatives can not persuade the Senate that they ought to leave those sections in, the House of Representatives will of course recede, as the Senate would if the proposition were an independent amendment of its own put on by it to which the House objected. The House of Representatives has an absolute right to make its own rules. It may provide that no legislation shall be had in that body except on appropriation bills, if it desires to do so, and we have no right at all to complain of it, the Chair thinks. The House of Representatives is the sole and independent judge of its own methods of procedure. If the Senate chooses to think that it is unwise to introduce any legislation on an appropriation bill it has the right to say so, and to say to the House of Representatives that it can not consent to introducing any legislation upon an appropriation bill good or bad, because "any" implies that it may be good or it may be bad. The Chair thinks, therefore, that the question is a perfectly simple one between the two Houses, and should occasion no collision whatever.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, it seems to me very clear that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] is right in his proposition, and that the rule never had and never could have any reference to an amendment of general legislation coming from the House on an appropriation bill. The Constitution vests the legislative power in the Senate and in the House, and it recognizes the power to propose amendments and to confer in regard to a disagreement upon any amendments as a part of the legislative power. A construction of the rule to the effect that the Senate shall not propose any amendment to a legislative provision in an appropriation bill coming from the House, and that this body shall be thus limited in its functions, is unquestionably a violation of the constitutional duty imposed upon the Senate. Therefore to assume that the rule of the Senate forbids the proposing of amendments affecting general legislation upon a House bill is unquestionably to say that the Senate shall not perform its constitutional duty of proposing amendments to legislation coming from the House.

I think that a construction of the rule which violates the Constitution and limits the constitutional functions of the Senate can never be sustained. Nothing can be clearer than this. To say that the House has a right to put such legislation on an appropriation bill and the Senate a right to refuse to amend it, because it is on an appropriation bill, is to affirm the truth of two contradictory things. It is to say the House has a right to legislate on an appropriation bill and the Senate is obliged to consider and amend such legislation as the House sends, but the Senate may refuse to consider and amend legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask for the reading of the amendment now pending to the House bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read for information.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, line 30, after the word "pension," the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, inserted:

Who shall have served at least three months after date of muster.

So as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That all applicants for pensions who shall have served at least three months after date of muster shall be presumed to have had no disability at the time of enlistment; but such presumption may be rebutted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. SHERMAN. This amendment fairly presents the trouble which has arisen between the two Houses in regard to legislative amendments to a general appropriation bill. The paragraph from line 17 to line 33 contains new and very important changes in the existing law. We have no right to call in question the power of the House to put this legislative provision on the bill. Even though it were a violation of the rules of the House, the House could by unanimous consent waive its rules and place this or any other legislative provision on a general appropriation bill. If the Senate has so tied itself up, if it has so disabled itself that it can not modify this proposed legislation, then indeed we have surrendered the most important power that we possess. The object of the Senate as an organic body was to correct and amend propositions made by the House as well as to propose new items, new propositions of a legislative character; but if we have no power to amend this general legislation, but must take it all or none, then we are practically disabled from legislating here and performing our functions as a separate and independent branch of the legislative power.

I have foreseen that the time would come when either the Senate must modify its rules or we must have all sorts of very faulty legislation proposed by the House in the hurry of their proceedings, often amid great confusion, and thus ingraft upon our appropriation bills legislative provisions that are entirely faulty, nugatory, or vicious. Nearly all the amendments of a legislative character proposed to appropriation bills by the House might, unamended, be faulty and injurious.

If the Senate by unanimous consent, as was done on Saturday, should waive its objection to legislative provisions, that is a different thing. We may waive our rules by unanimous consent. The bill that was passed Saturday contains probably fifteen or twenty different legislative provisions, and every one of them was agreed to by the Senate without objection.

We have a perfect right to waive our rules and by unanimous consent to agree to these legislative provisions. We have done that, but if a legislative provision comes to us from the other House that we desire to amend we certainly ought under our rules to have the power to amend such a provision. Therefore, when this subject was discussed the other day, I proposed that either by a ruling or by an amendment to our rules a modification be made, which I believe would meet all the difficulty we encounter. It is that, in the opinion of the Senate, amendments may be made in the Senate pertinent and relevant to legislative provisions in a general appropriation bill as it comes from the House.

If we would adopt that rule, or something similar to it, so that we should confine the amendments proposed in the Senate of a legislative character to propositions to amend the legislative provisions contained in the House bills, no great harm could result. Indeed, nearly all the legislative provisions that are hurriedly put on in the House or Senate are provisions which command the attention and the support of one or both Houses.

It seems to me there is no objection to this proposition, except that it ought to be qualified in one particular. We ought to have the power to qualify it. Take the next page of the bill, page 3. When I called for the reading of the pending amendment I supposed the amendment on page 3 to be the legislative provision involved in this debate. There it is proposed to limit the salary and emoluments of agents for the payment of pensions to $4,000, and no more, in every case. I am prepared to show that to limit the compensation of a pension agent to $4,000, cutting off all fees and throwing upon him all the expense of clerical force, &c., in some cases expenses of office rent, would be practically to disable the pension agent from transacting his business.

Mr. DAWES. The expenses to which the Senator refers do not come out of the pay of the agents.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is it $4,000 clear of all expenses?

Mr. DAWES. Clear of all expenses.

Mr. SHERMAN. That I did not know, because the provision does not so state.

Mr. DAWES. The bill provides subsequently that the agent shall pay his clerks, his rent, &c., out of another fund.

Mr. HALE. It comes out of the voucher fees. They pay the expenses of the office.

Mr. ALLISON. Still the Senator from Ohio is right in one sense. It is in a sense legislation, because it changes the compensation to be given to pension agents.

Mr. SHERMAN. It not only changes the amount of compensation, but it changes the rule of compensation.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator's argument is just as good as if the provision was as he first supposed.

Mr. SHERMAN. If we could vote on this proposition so as to reserve to the Senate the right to propose pertinent and relative amendments to legislative provisions in a general appropriation bill, I think that would be the best solution of the question for the present. But if, on the other hand, we sustain the ruling that has been made and properly stated by the Chair, that no legislative provision whatever of any kind modifying or altering the proposed legislation by the House is in order, then it seems to me we have disabled ourselves from performing our most important duty. I should feel disinclined to vote for any such rule. It is true that if we vote upon the question broadly by reversing the rule, as has been proposed, we practically substitute another rule, that all legislative provisions pertinent to pensions may be put on this bill as an amendment to propositions made by the House, and that is practically to nullify and repeal our rule. That is the danger I wish to avoid. I do not wish to open the door so wide that the Senate or the Senate committees may propose legislative provisions that go beyond the scope of the legislative provisions proposed by the House; but if we confine our power to offer legislative provisions merely to amendments to the provisions proposed by the House, I think there can be no great harm done. I should like to vote for that, but I do not know how that vote could be brought about except by a change of our rules.

I ask the Chair if it would be in order pending this appeal to propose a resolution in the nature of the opinion of the Senate expressed on the appeal, so that in case the decision of the Chair is not sustained we can by this order confine the amendments to pertinent and relevant amendments made to legislative provisions found in the House appropriation bills as they come to us?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not think it would be in order without unanimous consent.

Mr. SHERMAN. It can not be offered except by a proposed rule, if that is the case. Nor do I agree with the Chair, though perhaps I am wrong in that, in regard to committees of conference. Our rules do not apply to committees of conference. It seems to me that the plain reading of the rules says that they do not apply at all to conference committees. When a committee of conference is appointed it is a free conference. The only restriction upon the powers of a committee of conference is that it must introduce no new matter that has not already been voted upon in one House or the other. That is the rule, and there is no other restriction made upon a free conference. No instructions are given.

Therefore it seems to me, with due deference to the opinion of the Chair, that when a committee of conference is appointed by the Senate upon legislative provisions contained in an appropriation bill, that committee of conference is not restrained by the rules which apply to our standing and select committees. A conference committee is entirely distinct from one of the standing or select committees of the body. The one is an organ of the Senate itself; but when our conferees go into conference they cease to be organs of the Senate merely. They are not restrained in any way except that they can not propose any new item, either in amounts or language, or anything of that kind. They must take up and act on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and they may modify propositions upon which the two Houses disagree in any way they choose.

It would be unwise indeed to tie up the hands of a conference committee by any such construction as is suggested by the Chair. In that case a single Senator could prevent the passage of any appropriation bill at this session, or could have prevented the passage of any appropriation bill in the last twenty years. There is not a single bill reported back to us from a committee of conference that has not in some reepect done what the rules forbid a standing or select committee of the Senate to do, or perhaps forbid the Senate to adopt. A committee of conference is a free one, not restrained by these rules. The only restraint upon them is that they must try to bring about an agreement between the two Houses upon a particular substantive proposition which has been disagreed to between the two Houses. They may modify or change it as to amount, as to terms, and all that, and they may report so here. It is true we can reject the report of the conference committee and appoint a new one that will more strictly carry out the wishes of the Senate; but it seems to me that any rule or any construction of our rules which tends to tie up or limit the powers of a conference committee beyond the limit fixed as to all conferences would be unwise. It would place it in the power of a single Senator to defeat any conference report whatever. I take it the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] will know whether there has been a single general appropriation bill passed in this body since he has held the position of chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that would not be subject to objection on a point of order made by any Senator. I doubt if there is any such case.

Mr. ALLISON. I think almost without exception these bills contain legislation, but usually legislation limiting the appropriation itself or relating strictly to the appropriation. But, of course, in most of these bills in one way and another legislation does creep in, as the Senator from Ohio says.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say further that there has scarcely been an appropriation bill reported on which the Senate has not itself adopted legislative provisions, as it did on Saturday adopt several important legislative provisions.

Mr. INGALLS. In what bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. In the District of Columbia appropriation bill. There was one very important proposition of legislation contained in that bill, but it was adopted by unanimous consent. It was perfectly right; nobody raised the point of order, and it was agreed to; but suppose that after this has been done by general consent either House should object to it because the bill does contain provisions that have been agreed to by the Senate which are legislative in their character. A Senator might change his mind. After agreeing to the very proposition in the Senate he might change his mind, and when the committee of conference reported back an agreement upon the subject he might raise the point of order that the bill as it stands contains legislative provisions. It seems to me that that would not be logical. There should be no restraint whatever upon a committee of conference. It is a free and open conference where the representatives of the two Houses meet and discuss propositions and try to reconcile differences.

Now I will ask the unanimous consent of the Senate—I hardly expect it to be granted, but I hope it will be—that during the present session we may be at liberty to offer amendments to such legislative propositions as come to us from the House in respect to appropriations. I believe that would relieve us from the difficulty. Let it apply to the present session of Congress. If it does not work well we can ignore it at future sessions. It does not change our rules.

Mr. HALE. Let us see what the language is.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will send it to the desk.

Mr. BAYARD. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio submits a resolution for information. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That in the opinion of the Senate amendments may be made in the Senate pertinent and relevant to legislative provisions in a general appropriation bill as it comes from the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Ohio to ask unanimous consent that the resolution be now considered?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will accept the suggestion made by the Senator from Massachusetts, and modify it in one particular by saying that "a true construction of the rule authorizes," and so that it may be confined to amendments relating to and pertinent to particular items of legislation.

Mr. ALLISON. Does the Senator mean to apply that to this session only, or is it to be construed to be the rule for all time?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think I will leave it stand as in my original proposition. It will apply to the present session only.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair may be allowed to say not perhaps in response to but in connection with what the Senator from Ohio has said about the powers of conferees in respect of being free and not being obstructed, that the Chair has very vividly within his recollection that point being raised on what is called the "salary-grab" bill, and the Senate decided that it was not competent to instruct Senate conferees on that particular bill certainly. But an investigation which was submitted to the Senate afterward, and which has ever since been acquiesced in and acted upon, showed that in both Houses it had frequently been the practice for each House to instruct its conferees and agents as to what they should present and insist upon in their conference with the representatives of the other House.

Mr. SHERMAN. All I desire to say in respect to that point is that I have no doubt either body might instruct its conferees not only to insist but to adhere, but that would not be an ordinary parliamentary practice. It is very rarely indulged in. I do not know any such case.

Mr. DAWES. There are two kinds of conferences. One is a free conference, to which we commit bills, and the other is a special conference, to which instructions may be given by either branch; but a free conference is the one to which we usually commit bills.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt about the power of the Senate to adhere or to give instructions, but that is very rarely done, and when it has been proposed in certain cases it has generally been voted down. We may do it, but in an ordinary free conference, as it is called by parliamentary law, the whole matter of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses is sent to the conferees, and the only instruction they have is that they shall not put in new matter that has not been proposed in either House; and that is the old parliamentary law. In all other respects they are open and free, the result to be reported, as a matter of course, to their respective Houses.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I have never been able yet to yield my assent to the ruling of the Chair made at a former session of Congress, and, I understand, made again to-day by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], who was temporarily in the chair when the question was raised. I do not believe that it is possible under rules for a body to be placed in the anomalous position that a ruling of that kind would place this body in.

It is beyond any question whatever that the House of Representatives under its rules has a clear, well-defined right to send this legislation to the Senate. It has just as much right in a general appropriation bill which does not increase expenditures to send to the Senate legislation as it has a right to introduce a bill and send it to the Senate, to introduce a resolution and send it to the Senate. General legislation on an appropriation bill is just as clearly rightfully here now and under consideration now in the Senate as if it was contained in a separate bill sent from the House.

Mr. HALE. Or as the rest of the bill.

Mr. FRYE. Or as the rest of the bill. There can not be any question about that. Now, is it possible that there can be a rule which properly construed prevents us from taking any action whatever upon legislation truly, correctly, properly before this body? I am not prepared to believe it, Mr. President. I do not believe that there is anything in the Senate rule which says so. I know that in well-settled parliamentary law no rule can be found which shall put a body in the position we find ourselves in if the ruling is correct. If it is not to be found in well-settled parliamentary law, then you must look to a rule of the Senate which directly, affirmatively, positively says that no such legislation shall be received. I respectfully contend that in Rule XVI there is no such prohibition.

No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill.

The proposition here is not a proposition of general legislation offered by the Senate of the United States to a general appropriation bill. It is simply a proposition to amend general legislation on the House appropriation bill which is properly and rightfully here in the Senate for consideration. I contend respectfully that it is a strained construction of clause 3, Rule XVI, which leads to a ruling by the Chair that does affect a proposition such as that made here on the floor of the Senate to amend the general legislation in this bill. [A pause.]

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. FRYE. I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. HARRIS. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. FRYE. I was undertaking to discuss as well as I could to the presiding officer of this body a question touching a ruling which had been made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair begs pardon of the Senator from Maine. The Chair supposed the Senator was addressing himself to the general question.

Mr. FRYE. I was contending that the ruling which had been made here before by a former presiding officer and the ruling which had been made to-day was not a correct ruling under Rule XVI of the Senate. In clause 3 of Rule XVI of the Senate, which is the clause which would be cited to sustain the ruling, in the first sentence of that clause it is provided that—

No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill.

I was respectfully contending that the proposition now before the Senate to amend general legislation in an appropriation bill was not general legislation proposed to be received in the United States Senate to a general appropriation bill, but was simply an amendment offered to general legislation contained in an appropriation bill coming from the House, which came rightfully from the House, which is here under the rules of the House and must be considered by the Senate as coming rightfully under the rules of the House. I believe under a fair construction of the rule any provision which is on a general appropriation bill coming from the House under their rule may be open to amendment in the United States Senate.

I do not believe in the proposition made by the Senator from Ohio touching this method of legislation. I do not believe that the Senate of the United States should open Rule XVI one jot or one tittle. I believe it is the most dangerous legislation that can possibly come before a legislative body, and I believe the experience of the two Houses of Congress ought to have taught us that by this time.

The first time it was ever resorted to, I think, was in 1855, when the House of Representatives deliberately ingrafted upon a civil and diplomatic appropriation bill a reduction of the tariff and sent it to the United States Senate. The United States Senate contested that for weeks and weeks, and a distinguished Senator from Delaware, Senator Bayard, took strong ground against such legislation and declared that it was dangerous to the very form of existence of a republican government, and Senator Clayton took ground similar to it. The Senate resisted the attempt, and the House yielded.

The next instance was a provision put in the House upon an Army appropriation bill in 1856. The Senate resisted it on the same ground. Congress adjourned and no Army appropriation bill was passed, and there was an extra session.

The next case was in 1865, on the sundry civil appropriation bill, where the House put a provision that no man should be tried by military authority wherever there was a United States court; and again the Senate resisted and resisted to the bitter end. The bill failed, and the appropriations could not be made till Congress again assembled.

I do not find that the proposition on the part of the House to put legislation on appropriation bills ever prevailed until the measure in the Forty-second Congress increasing salaries. That did prevail; it became a law; but it humiliated the Congress of the United States more profoundly than any legislation that it had ever enacted before; it humiliated individual members of Congress as nothing else ever humiliated them before, and it compelled Congress at the very earliest opportunity in the next session to repeal every single word of that legislation.

All these propositions were put upon appropriation bills before there was any rule of the House which authorized any general legislation on an appropriation bill; they were put onto appropriation bills by the action of the House itself, by its majority, and not by virtue of a rule, for there was no rule for it; on the contrary the rules of the House of Representatives were as strict in relation to general legislation on their bills as the rules of the Senate to-day. Up to that time, and including even that last proposition of the House——

Mr. INGALLS. To what date?

Mr. FRYE. Eighteen hundred and seventy-three it was; what was known as the "salary grab." The present rule of the House was not adopted until some time later than that, and the only proposition which has attracted general attention since the House adopted the present rule was that to repeal certain provisions by which troops were at the polls on election days and by which supervisors and United States deputy marshals were employed in certain duties about the polls. That is fresh in the memory of every Senator, and I do not believe there is a Senator who wants that history repeated. It was in the Forty-fifth Congress. It was an angry, exciting, exasperating debate. Congress closed and two great appropriation bills were not passed—the Army bill and the legislative, executive, and judicial bill. We were called in extra session within less than a month's time. We remained in extra session for over four months, one of the most exciting sessions that this country has ever seen in time of peace. Veto after veto came; crimination and recrimination; attack and defense. And that is the only general legislation of any manner of importance, at least of importance enough to attract the attention of the country, under the new rule. Surely there was nothing in that which ought to lead the United States Senate to encourage the House in keeping on its books the existing rule allowing legislation on appropriation bills.

Again, if Senators will notice the House rule is curiously drawn. It is drawn so that you can destroy everything, build nothing. As a distinguished member of the House once said, it was drawn so that you could level down but you never could level up. Here we are to-day within fifteen or twenty days of the close of the session and not any great appropriation bill yet before the Senate. On the remainder of the appropriation bills, some of them not yet reported from the Committee on Appropriations of the House, there may be general legislation under the House rule which shall destroy the Army of the United States; which shall destroy its Navy; which shall cripple and destroy all of your foreign consulships and diplomatic agencies; which shall cripple your post-office and mail facilities; which shall destroy the judiciary almost entirely; and not any legislation that can build up any one of them if it costs a dollar; any legislation if it is germane to the bill itself and reduces expenditure; none which increase expenditures.

Now, Mr. President, I do not believe under the experience of the past and under that rule with its peculiar nature that the Senate of the United States ought to encourage the House in keeping that rule on the book. It was adopted in 1876, I think. It was offered by the member from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]; it was reported from the Committee on the Rules by Mr. COX; it was indorsed by the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, Mr. RANDALL, for special purposes then existing. The committee, at the revision made subsequently to that, undertook to repeal it, but that committee having agreed beforehand that no amendment to any rule should be reported unless with unanimity, and unanimity not being obtained, that rule, as a matter of course, came back to the House as it stood, and it is kept on its book to-day as one of the rules of the House. I do not believe that a majority of the members of the House are in favor of that rule, and I do believe that the time is coming and not far distant when the joint rule sent to the House of Representatives by the Senate at the very last session will be accepted by the House. I do believe that if the Senate stands firm in this matter, ultimately the House will rescind that portion of that rule under which all these troubles have arisen.

Mr. President, it may be said that a ruling of the Chair, such as I say I believe to be correct, would do all the harm and mischief that positive and affirmative action on the part of the Senate as recommended by the Senator from Ohio would do. Whether it would or not, I can not help it. I have examined this question with care. I did examine it when the late Senator from Illinois, then President of the Senate, for the first time made that ruling, and I do not believe that the Senate can be placed in so anomalous a position by anything which is legitimately, fairly, and under the rules properly before the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). Mr. President, I think that we are proceeding on a slight misapprehension in respect to the powers of the two Houses. Referring to what my friend from Maine [Mr. FRYE] has said, I wish to state with all the emphasis of which I am capable that it is no matter of ours constitutionally, whatever we may think of it personally as citizens, what kind of rules the House of Representatives adopts for its own proceedings. It is absolutely independent and we have no right in this Chamber to question the wisdom even or propriety of its methods of doing business. If the House of Representatives had a rule which authorized every species of legislation upon an appropriation bill, it would be a matter of which we should have no right to complain as a body here, whatever we might think of it as private citizens in respect to the wisdom of that sort of thing. The same might be true in the Senate, and we might have a rule here which would authorize on appropriation bills coming from the House every species of legislative amendment, germane or not, so as to make such a bill an omnibus and put on everything that a majority of the Senate chose to put on, and the House of Representatives would not have the slightest reason to complain of our right to propose that to them, but they would have a right to say, as we have a right to say on their legislation, that they could not consent to that method of procedure; and when they said that they could not consent to it, we should be put in the attitude of saying "we will not carry on the Government unless the House of Representatives will consent to change the laws in the particulars that we have named," a position that, of course, everybody will understand is totally indefensible, absurd, wicked. There is no phrase that you can state it too strongly in. Both Houses are independent.

I do not see, therefore, the force of the criticisms upon whatever the House rules may be. They have a right to have their own rules according to their own notions of the best way of doing their business. When they send a bill to us, be it an appropriation bill or any other bill, if there is any section or clause in the bill that comes here which the Senate of the United States is unwilling to agree to, either because on discussion it believes it to be unwise, or because on principle it believes it has no place on that bill and it ought not to be considered in connection with the other subjects in the bill, and so have a general rule about it, the House of Representatives has no right to complain; and that, on the other hand, would put them, if they insisted upon it, in the attitude of saying "we will not appropriate money to carry on the Army or the Navy or the Post-Office, or to pay pensions, unless the Senate of the United States will consent to change the laws in respect of the general regulation of this business; unless the Senate will consent to do that we will not have any appropriation at all." They can not stand upon any such position. They never have and they never will, because they are just as patriotic as we are, and they, recognizing as we do the absolute independence of the two Houses, know perfectly well that neither House can insist upon the other's consenting to affirmative propositions that both are not willing to agree to, whether it is under a rule, or whether it is under a discussion of a particular question.

That is all clear enough as it seems to me. Now, if we had a joint rule, such as my friend from Maine refers to, prohibiting all legislation on appropriation bills, what would be the effect of that? Suppose in the Senate an amendment comes from the Committee on Appropriations contrary to that joint rule? The Chair, the point being made, rules it out of order because the custom is that the Chair on reports from committees, and very often on motions by Senators to amend bills, does not make the point of order himself. He waits. No point of order is made, although the amendment violates the joint rule. On the point of order being suggested, unanimous consent is asked to let that go on and send it to the House of Representatives to see if unanimous consent can not be got there to do the same thing. What good does your joint rule do? It comes back to the point of a proposition by the Senate to the House to suspend that joint rule for the time being and let that legislation go on, and then you get into the same question. To be sure, one member might object and then the Speaker would say "I can not suspend it."

What is the state of the bill then? What are you to do with it? It is a bill that one House has sent to the other House, and then you have to say "We refuse to receive the bill at all because it violates our joint understanding."

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator from Vermont a question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes.

Mr. HOAR. Will not the effect of the joint rule be this, that it will at least confine this abuse, if it be an abuse, to the passage of those measures which are so clearly demanded by public necessity that they command unanimous consent?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That would be the effect, but it still does not fail to illustrate the proposition that as between the two Houses neither can act without the assent of the other, and you have only in the case of a joint rule accumulated difficulties of getting that assent. That is all there is to it.

I repeat, the Senate has no right to complain of whatever rule the House of Representatives has, be it much or little. If we think really and seriously (which I begin to doubt) that legislation on appropriation bills is unwise, let us say so by adhering to our rule. The legislation proposed may be good in a particular instance, as in this, if you please, very good indeed; but if it is good in this instance, and you have a rule that tolerates it, the next instance may be one where it is very bad, and yet where you can get a majority, it may be not understanding the question in the heat of excitement, or whatever it may be, in the fear of the failure of a bill, to sanction it. Therefore, if you open the door at all, you open the door to every amendment that may be proposed in the methods which are indicated, and then you load up your appropriation bills just as you did before.

Now, what can we do? All that we have to do is to say by a rule, or without a rule by the vote of the Senate at this moment, that we do not think legislation on an appropriation bill is a good thing, and we have, therefore, rejected all the parts of the House bill relating to pensions that are legislation, and we must stand upon it; not as undertaking to dictate to the House of Representatives; we do nothing of the kind. We say we are unable to assent to sundry affirmative propositions, sections 4, 5, 6, and 7 of this bill. We are perfectly willing to appropriate this money to pay pensions under existing laws, and we are willing to consider changes in existing laws on bills appropriate for that purpose and not on bills paying money from the Treasury to carry out existing laws, and we can not accede to your proposition to change existing laws in this bill.

When we do that, what does the House of Representatives say as a patriotic body, as it is? "The Senate of the United States has a notion; we do not think that it is a wise notion; but we have no business to quarrel with it. They are unwilling to legislate in this manner. The question, therefore, is whether we will pay pensions under the laws as they stand, that either House has had the right to propose a change in during all its session but has not; or will have no payment at all until the Senate can be got to agree on this very bill or another like it to change these laws." Neither House will stand on any such thing as that. You can not find a member of the other House or of this body who will stand up and maintain it. Our way, therefore, is perfectly clear. If we sincerely believe that legislation on appropriation bills is bad, all we have to do is to strike out under our existing rules whatever legislation there is in a House bill and say to the House of Representatives in a conference, or without a conference, as we do when we send the bill back with the amendment, "We are unwilling to put these provisions on this bill; we are willing to consider them on any appropriate bill at any time." There is no collision; there is no contest, there is nothing about it except the simple independence of the two Houses.

If you take the other line, and hold to this rule, which I am bound to say the Senator from Connecticut occupying the chair has interpreted as it has been interpreted ever since the rule existed, and, as I am told by our friend who sits here as the Reporter, who remembers more about the practice of legislation than any gentleman whom I know, as was the practice under special rules and orders about appropriation bills before from session to session, which carries me back to the time of Mr. Colfax that I referred to—if you do that, and hold to what has been held all this time, then you are simply driven to the alternative of saying, "We will take the House legislation, as bad and imperfect as it is, and let it go," or else say, "We will strike it all out."

I remember perfectly well in the time of Mr. Wheeler, I myself, standing at this very desk, thinking that possibly within this rule an amendment to House legislation might be in order, proposed an amendment that was clearly necessary and that nobody denied, and the Vice-President, occupying the chair, ruled within this very rule as it now stands that it was not competent to offer that amendment to a legislative provision in an appropriation bill because it was an amendment to the bill, and if one amendment were offered to it, any other amendment that related to that general subject by way of addition of just as many sections as the Senate chose to put on would still be in order, and that the moment you departed from the rigor of the rule you would open the whole question of putting on germane legislation, which is a very indefinite term, and which the rules provide shall be determined by the Senate according to its wishes and notions, and not as a matter of strict order by the Chair.

So then the real question is, I think, whether the Senate actually believes and desires that it will not have legislation on appropriation bills. If it wishes legislation on appropriation bills, it is only necessary to overrule the decision of the Chair, which has conformed to all previous decisions—every one—and open the door to additions and changes to legislation within the scope of the bill under the other provisions of the rule, or else to say, "We will have none of it; we will appropriate the money to carry out the laws as they stand, and we will change the laws as they stand on independent bills."

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, it seems to me this question is one which affects very seriously the constitutional power and dignity of the Senate in legislation. We send over to the House of Representatives bills by the hundred. There were some time ago when I counted them about three hundred Senate bills on the House Calendar or the Speaker's table untouched, sent there in the ordinary way under the constitutional power of the Senate to propose general legislation; and they remain, so far as we have any official information, untouched and not to be touched.

The House sends up to us such few measures of general legislation as persons in that body who have the power of obstructing general business choose to select and approve, at the close of the session, upon appropriation bills, and if we submit to that proceeding because of the necessity or convenience of a particular period of the session, you have extended the constitutional claim of the House to originate money or appropriation bills, as it is construed, to originating all legislation whatever. Here is the bankruptcy bill; here is the library bill; here are a dozen bills which I enumerated the other day in the hearing of the Senate; important matters, including the bill in regard to the Presidential count; measures which have commanded almost the unanimous assent of this body without distinction of party, every one of them, and they remain absolutely untouched, and a few measures of general legislation are sent up here at the end of the session and you are asked to take them or to let the Government stop because otherwise the appropriation bills will fail. You are asked to mature them, not by the ordinary process of debate and consultation and consideration, but you are asked to take them in their final shape at the hands of an Appropriations Committee at midnight, two or three days before the session ends; and you are bound so to take them or submit yourselves to the inconvenience and the country to the disturbance of a special session of Congress.

Now, if we, by modifying our rule, or by making a special rule for the time being, which can be extended for every time being under the same circumstances as proposed by my honorable friend from Ohio, say that if we can not get any legislation in the ordinary way, we will take it when proposed by the House of Representatives upon an appropriation bill, you may just as well amend the Constitution of the United States and declare that henceforth all legislation whatever is to be proposed by the House of Representatives, and that we are a body exercising only a veto power like that of the Executive.

Mr. HARRISON. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the fact that one of the important provisions of general legislation in this very bill was passed by the Senate at the last session in our general pension bill, and the House has selected one of those provisions, all ready passed by us, and put that on here.

Mr. HOAR. I do not believe any Senator will question that it is a most vicious form of legislation to send in provisions of general legislation from one House to the other or from the two Houses to the President of the United States with the declaration, "This legislation is the condition upon which an adequate provision is to be made for the support of the Government during the year, according to existing laws." There was an attitude of that kind, as the Senator from Maine has said, taken a few years ago, and it was supported for a little while by some very able, some very clear-headed, some very honest, and some very patriotic members of this body; but on reflection it did not meet their approbation, I think; they abandoned the position after a little while. A very distinguished Senator from Delaware, whose name is represented in this body, was quoted as having uttered thirty years ago in the Senate his judgment that the establishment of that practice was one of the most dangerous things to the Constitution of the United States which could possibly happen.

The fathers of the Republic, and statesmen of both parties of all sections of a later generation, have agreed, as it has been agreed in England—because the practice of putting general legislation upon their bills of supply has been discontinued now for more than a century and a half—the agreement has been there and here that this is one of the most dangerous forms of legislation. In my judgment it would be better for us to submit to the inconveniences of an extra session, however grave and serious those may be, rather than make an inroad upon the position which has been taken and assumed by the Senate after great deliberation in this matter.

Mr. President, I do not believe that the patience of the American people will very long tolerate that either of its legislative bodies shall live and be fettered under a system of rules which deprives the constitutional majority of that body of the right to consider, deliberate, debate, and decide on the grave legislative questions which affect the welfare of the American people, and carry out after that deliberation the will of the constitutional majority of that body. I do not believe they will submit to the practical overthrow of the constitutional provision that laws shall be made, laws shall be changed, laws shall be repealed, grievances shall be redressed whenever a majority of each of the two bodies elected under the Constitution shall think best.

Why, take the bankruptcy bill; it was almost the unanimous desire of this body to pass that bill after full and thorough discussion and deliberation upon its details; and I believe there is no legislative body in this country under the Constitution of whom it is not the desire by a two-thirds majority at least to pass that bill, and still we receive no notice of its passage, and I am not at liberty to say whether it happens that some dozen or twenty gentlemen are able by methods not in accordance with the spirit of the Constitution to prevent the passage of that much-desired measure. That is a mere illustration.

There are some gentlemen in this body who are opposed to that legislation; but I could name a dozen bills which each one, probably, of the gentlemen who oppose that legislation favor, and which also are favored by large majorities of the American people and of both Houses of Congress, that fail to get through for the same reason.

If we submit to this keeping of general legislation on appropriation bills, or if we make that submission easier by reversing the ruling of the Senator from Connecticut and saying that instead of rejecting it in toto we will take it and amend it and pass it, we make that condition of things to which I have alluded much more likely to be permanent. I think we should plant ourselves at the gate and we should say that we will do nothing here which makes it easier to prevent the carrying out the will of a constitutional majority of the people and of the representatives of the people in legislation, and we will do nothing to establish or to continue the practice which presents general legislation to the Senate or to the Executive and says: "Agree to it or the supplies necessary for carrying on the Government shall fail."

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the great importance of the question involved in this discussion must be my apology for troubling the Senate at all upon it.

If there be one admitted corner-stone in the structure of this Government of laws designed to promote liberty, it was the independence of the two Houses of Congress. There is no feature of our Government so frequently referred to and so emphatically expressed as the one I have stated in the constitution of the Government. They are to be absolutely independent of each other, and the consent of both acting independently of each other is to be obtained before any measure can become a law, no matter what may be the majority in one House or the other.

It is obvious that for the transaction of public business for the public welfare a spirit of comity must prevail between the two Houses, a desire on either part to promote the great objects of the Government, not to obstruct them; for if the desire of obstruction shall prevail, then an illustration of our unfitness for self-government will have been given.

One of the features of the Constitution securing this independence is that each House shall determine the rules of its own proceedings. It is true that they can make a joint rule, but it is also true that that rule is binding only until either House shall retire from it. It is expected that the spirit of comity, that a grave sense of public duty, a sense of self-respect and propriety will so constrain members of the two Houses that rules shall not be enacted in haste and repealed at mere will; but the fact nevertheless remains that the rules of the Senate are absolutely within the control of the Senate, and they may be suspended at the pleasure of the Senate in accordance with such terms and by such notice as the rules themselves may regularly provide.

And herein I must differ from my distinguished friend from Maine, who in the course of this discussion has been disposed to state as a fact for our consideration and as having authority upon us that the action of the House in this or any other respect has been regularly in accordance with its rules of order. I submit to that Senator we have nothing to do with the regularity or the irregularity of the proceedings of the House under its own rules. The House is, so far as we are concerned, a law unto itself. It may suspend its own rules from day to day; it may change them; and I apprehend we have no right here in discussion to bring into consideration the regularity of the proceedings of the other branch of Congress either with or without rules of their own. If that be so—and I say it because the Senator cited the fact that a feature of general legislation had been ingrafted upon a mere money bill called an appropriation bill, and that it had been done under the admitted rules of the House—with due respect to the Senator, I do not care whether it was done under the admitted rules or not. If it comes to us in the ordinary channel of communication, we are to treat it—how? According to our own rules and our own sense of comity in the transaction of public business.

The proposition of the honorable Senator from Ohio would seem to me to give up entirely the principle that I think it is essential for us to maintain, first, the independence, and next, the question of the wisdom of the rule we have made on the subject, Rule XVI. That rule forbids amendments of a legislative character upon a general appropriation bill. I am not here to repeat what has often been said before, and I think seldom better said than it has been said to-day in this Chamber, of the danger of permitting general legislation to be attached to appropriation bills, money bills for the necessary expenses of the Government. I do not propose to reiterate to the Senate now the reasons for that wise rule. Long ago, upon the first examination of the subject I became convinced of the profound importance of avoiding legislation of that character, and I would protest now, as I have always protested, and this without exception in the last sixteen years, against the Senate being compelled to legislate in defiance of its own rules and under duress because of the manner in which legislation was presented to the Senate.

I know that there was in some quarters a claim made to grant appropriations only upon terms, that it was in the power of either House to couple provisions of general legislation with an appropriation bill, and so to coerce one House, or both Houses joining together to coerce the Executive and compel him to give his unwilling signature to a law that he knew to be vicious because that bill contained appropriations necessary for the maintenance and support of the Government. Sir, against that principle I am just as much opposed to-day as I ever was, and I never have given to it my consent, for it seems to me that to yield ourselves to such a doctrine is to deposit in the hands of the House having the power to originate these bills, the power to attach to them such conditions as would make them masters of the whole. In other words, it would resolve all the powers of this Government into a single House of the legislative branch.

But, sir, the Senator from Ohio says that he proposes now that we shall not repeal the language of our own rule, but that if general legislation comes to us we may amend it. It is an axiom of mathematics that things which are equal to the same thing are equal to one another. The power of amendment is unlimited, and the power of amendment may ingraft every original proposition that could have been conceived in the original features of the law. If the Senate can tack on under the name of amendment to general legislation anything that it devises, there is not a law of the United States relating to our general policy that may not be changed upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. President, the situation is a very serious one; it is very grave. I appreciate it fully; but I believe always that where a principle is profound and important and is recognized it should not be abandoned. I do not propose by my vote to open wide this gate for the influx of measures without end, and to a system of legislation which I believe is practically destructive of all the philosophic machinery of checks and balances under a government of laws that our Constitution was intended to create. If it shall be that drifting along, from one cause or another, one of the Houses of Congress—and I am speaking now by way of illustration—shall have gotten its rules for the transaction of business into such a perfectly insensible and incomprehensible and obstructive condition that no measure, good or bad, questionable or not, can be brought before that House for decision but that it must await the moment of necessity of the Government, a time when every branch needs money to keep it in motion, and then, and then only, ingrafted upon such a bill, can a hearing be obtained for those measures which the machinery of their rules absolutely prohibits in the ordinary, regular, thoughtful manner of presenting business—if such a state of things as that has arrived, if it be true that a republican government is to be carried on under that species of snap judgment and duress, the remedy had better be applied now and a stand had better be taken now. It will always be inconvenient to take it; it will always give rise to some extra personal labor and responsibility; but it might as well be met, because I can see—and I think without the slightest desire of exaggerating the results—the absolute destruction of all those tests for the justice, the honesty, the reasonableness of measures of legislation that parliamentary rules as known to the fathers of this Republic and to their descendants were ever intended to secure.

No, sir, there must be two things. There are two independent judgments. They ought to be those of men acting in a spirit of comity for a great public end. Neither can coerce the other, and neither ought to be able to do it. The sense of public duty should weigh equally upon each, and each must be responsible for the manner in which they shall recognize that public duty. There can not be force, but there can and there ought to be reason and conscience; and without reason and conscience, and without a sense of comity between the Houses of Congress, between all the branches of Congress, it is in vain to talk about a just or a possible administration of the affairs of this great country.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I object, for one, to this proposition being considered as of the kind just stated by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] when in his seat and not in the chair, that it was simply a question whether or not the Senate desired legislation to be incorporated into general appropriation bills. Upon that I do not believe there is much difference in this body. I do not think the sense of the Senator from Vermont or the sense of the Senator from Delaware is any keener upon the dangers that may result from general legislation being incorporated on appropriation bills than is mine or that of other Senators in this body.

We all realize how that it fundamentally does break up the opportunity for discussion, for investigation, and for considering grave subjects-matter in the early part of the session when time can be given commensurately to that consideration; and there is no man here who will not at all proper times and places object to appropriation bills being made the vehicle for great measures of public legislation and precipitated upon this body in the waning days of each session. There is nobody here who can appreciate that better than my friend the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations; there are no men in the Senate who know it and realize it better than all the members of that committee; and there are no Senators here who desire to be relieved of this irksome addition to labor and responsibility more than the members of the Committee on Appropriations. So it is not, Mr. President, a question whether the Senate desires legislation upon appropriation bills. I have the right to assume that we all agree in that.

I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] as to the evils. I recall, with some satisfaction, my own experience in another place at the time that the very rule under which the House thrusts in the face of the Senate repeatedly great measures of general legislation upon appropriation bills was adopted in that body, and the efforts that I made to prevent it, and the evils that it seemed to me would grow out of it. But what I am seeking here to help to bring the Senate to is the practical consideration of the situation that confronts us.

When the Senator from Vermont, re-enforced by the Senator from Delaware, declares the proposition, which I beg leave to say is by no means new to other Senators, that neither House may coerce the other and that it is the bounden duty of each to cultivate a spirit of comity and to try to bring about harmony, there is nothing novel in that proposition. There is nothing novel in the proposition that the body which legislates, which seeks to force affirmative legislation, ought not to coerce the other body. The Senator from Vermont says that it is an easy thing for the Senate to take that attitude, and if the House sends to us legislation upon an appropriation bill and the Senate declines to accept it, to stand there like a rock, like a stone wall, and the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from Massachusetts say, let there be an extra session. Is the Senate ready to take that position? The proof whether it will take that position, not in argument, not in illustration, not in incitement as to what we ought to do, but the real, sober question of what we will do, is now straight before our noses.

The House of Representatives has sent a regular appropriation bill with items of appropriation for the payment of money to the great army of pensioners for whom we so liberally provide year by year? In addition to that, it has selected certain legislation that was passed last year upon an appropriation bill that has worked irksomely and onerously and oppressively upon the great mass of pensioners, out of the operation of the rules as they are now, which gentlemen are so tenacious of standing by. That legislation was passed by this body and became a law, containing provisions that since then have worked to the damage of the pensioners, and a great uproar has come up from that great body of men demanding relief. The House of Representatives under its rules has selected those features of oppressive legislation that put every pensioner at the mercy of the claim agent that had his case, whereby he was obliged to double and more than double the fee to be paid to that claim agent—the House has selected the provisions contained in that law, and under its rules has sent to the Senate provisions in this bill repealing those features of the law.

Now, the question is whether, when there is good legislation upon an appropriation bill, when there is admittedly wise legislation upon an appropriation bill, when there is legislation that affects and touches men, women, and children in all the States who demand the relief, the Senate will upon the rule and upon the attitude invoked by Senators here simply say, "We decline to give this relief; we decline upon the general ground that we will not suffer any infraction of the principle under which we mean that appropriation bills shall be passed shorn of legislative enactment."

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Maine allow me to ask if it is not true that we have passed that identical measure and sent it down to the House, so that they have nothing to do but to say yes to it and make it a law?

Mr. HALE. I know that very well, but the test case that is brought up here is the bill whereupon that beneficent legislation may be made a law or may be defeated, and Senators have to confront it there. The fact that we have sent over a bill to the House of Representatives which is lodged in the great mass of matter that is piled up mountain high on the Speaker's table does not relieve the Senate of the responsibility. This beneficent legislation will pass upon the pension appropriation bill, or it will receive its death-blow and will not pass, and Senators may as well realize that they are to be confronted with this question, whether they shall strike this out and let it pass from this session to another, or will pass upon it and let it become a law now.

If the Senate is ready upon the grounds taken by the Senators from Vermont, and Massachusetts, and Delaware, much older, abler, wiser, better Senators than we who are younger here, then let us understand it, but do not let the Senate be put in the attitude that it stands up here for the cause of public virtue in legislation and speaks by its rule, and that the moment the question comes in practical application it turns about and runs from its conclusions, and thereby submits itself to the merited reproach on the part of the House of Representatives that it has no faith in its declarations, and that all that the Senate means when it declares that general legislation shall not be put upon appropriation bills is that it will stamp out with its veto the measures that it does not want passed, and will allow to pass the measures that it does not see fit to resist. I want to free the Senate from that attitude. I do not want the House to be able to reproach us in that way. Let us have either one rule or the other. And it seems to me, recognizing all the evils that come from general legislation upon appropriation bills, that if this body is confined strictly to pertinent and germane amendments upon propositions that come from the House, leaving us to deal with them, this body will maintain a consistent attitude better than it will if it tries to adopt this procustean rule which says no letter of legislation shall be allowed upon an appropriation bill, no matter how sound and judicious it is in itself.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, this present contention I understand to be whether notwithstanding our rules that forbid amendments to be received containing general legislation to appropriation bills, we shall nevertheless allow the House of Representatives, we having deprived ourselves of that privilege, to present just such measures of general legislation upon appropriation bills as it desires, we reserving to ourselves the right to amend those propositions. It is said that is a practical rather than a theoretical question, and I want to look at it for a moment as a practical question.

First, we agree that all such legislation is wrong, is vicious, is dangerous, is destructive. We start with that admitted proposition. Then we come to this, that we are to receive from the House of Representatives legislation which, if we judge the future by the past, will be of a vicious character, will be dangerous, will possibly be destructive to our system of government, and that we confine ourselves simply and purely to trying to make it better. And it is said that that is a consistent position for the Senate to take. I think it is an extremely inconsistent position for the Senate to take.

I am utterly opposed to depriving ourselves of the right to ingraft upon appropriation bills such legislation as we in our wisdom think is proper to be enacted, and confining ourselves to the paltry privilege of saying that the legislation which is sent to us from the other branch of Congress, which has been hastily considered, illy considered, or not considered at all, may simply be revised and made not quite so bad as it is in the shape in which it comes to us, for that is all we gain by the proposed rule.

For myself I believe that we have just only to be firm once, and that is the end of this trouble. I believe that if we have convictions now, to-day, at this session, as I believe the Senate and all Senators in it have, that this kind of legislation is vicious and wrong, we have but to say so and the trouble will be ended. The difficulty about it is that while we all agree that it is wrong in principle, while we all agree that it is better in the particular case speaking as a matter of principle, to say that there shall be no general legislation on appropriation bills, yet some of us feel so anxious to have some particular measure passed which comes from the House of Representatives that we abandon our principle for the time being, and we say, "Oh, yes; for this once let us abandon the principle and get this little matter of legislation which we really think ought to be adopted." So to get a little good we submit to a very great evil. We can not legislate in that way. It comes every day. The pinch of it comes just when there is some matter like this pension matter that we all desire to see passed. It seems to me that if we once say we will not abandon our position and our principle for the sake of a little temporary gain, we shall have no real trouble about this matter in the future.

It always comes that this argument is made: "Why, if you do not take this legislation which has been sent from the other branch of Congress you are going to have an extra session, and are you ready to meet the question whether there shall be an extra session of Congress?"

Well, Mr. President, I do not believe that there is any Senator who desires an extra session of Congress; I do not believe that there is any member of the other branch who desires an extra session of Congress, but just so long as that argument can be held up to us as a bugbear—if that be a proper legislative term to use—just so long we shall fail to accomplish what we desire to accomplish in the way of legislating in a manner which we believe to be proper, to be constitutional, and to be for the best interests of this Government.

Take this bill. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] asks are you going to refuse to take this general pension legislation upon this appropriation bill; all the pensioners want it, and do you wish to put yourselves in the attitude of having an extra session of Congress by rejecting it from this appropriation bill? How is an extra session of Congress to come if we say our rules are such as prevent legislation on appropriation bills, and our principle is such that we can not accede to legislation which comes on appropriation bills from the House of Representatives? How is any extra session going to follow any such action of the Senate as that? Simply, if it comes at all, by the other branch saying, "You must take that legislation upon that appropriation bill or you can not have the appropriation bill." Now, if it be within the rules of the Senate, I desire to say that I have no idea that the House of Representatives is going to put itself in that attitude. I have no fear of it. I do not believe there is any such danger; but I do believe that there is danger to the legislation of this country every time we are influenced by an argument of that sort.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I concur very heartily in all that is said about the danger of legislation upon appropriation bills. That has been too well understood, I believe, in the Senate to be denied by any one.

Here we have a practical measure before us. We have a legislative provision in this bill which proposes to repeal an act that was passed at the last session unknown to a large number of the members of this House, whereby certain pension agents are to receive out of this very appropriation bill some two or three million dollars. The question is now whether we shall so far depart from our rule as to prevent such a result, or whether we shall adhere to our rule and let the very money that we appropriate here for the benefit of pensioners go into the pockets of pension agents? Suppose we accomplish all that has been predicted by the Senator from Connecticut; suppose we drive the House from its position; suppose that the House does recede and takes off all this legislation, what is the result? We then pass the pension appropriation bill and, according to my information, from two to three million dollars of the money thus appropriated will be diverted from the pensioners and go into the hands of pension agents. I say that to avoid such a result as that, to prevent such a fraud and wrong upon the pensioners as well as upon the Treasury, from which the money is appropriated, I am willing to suspend for the time being, in conformity with the resolution of the Senator from Ohio, the rule that we have adopted to govern our action in this case.

The Senate I believe with entire unanimity passed a bill on Friday or Saturday to correct the very evil that is corrected in this pension appropriation bill. Everybody knows that the bill which we sent to the House can not become a law. We are therefore stultifying ourselves, simply by adherence to an iron rule, to do that which in the judgment not only of this body but of the other House ought to be done to secure the pensioners of this country against the wrong that was done by the legislation of the last session.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator will permit me a word. He says everybody knows that that bill can not become a law. I for one wish to dissent from that sweeping statement. I do not know that it can not become a law. I think I know that it can become a law. I think I know there is no difficulty about that bill becoming a law.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I confess that I do not know, but the statement was made by the Senator from Maine a few moments ago that with the great mass of business on the Speaker's table it was utterly impossible to reach that bill, and I accepted that as about the conclusion to which every fair-minded man would come who understands anything about the rules of the House. But I am not willing to take the risk of its becoming a law. I want to save this money to the pensioners of the country; I do not want it to go, and it ought not to go into the hands of the pension agents; and the question I am now called upon to meet——

Mr. HALE. The Senator means not the pension agents, but the claim agents, pension attorneys.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yes, claim agents. I am called upon to meet the question whether I shall vote to adhere to the Senate rule and thereby take from the pensioners of this country from two to three million dollars, or whether I shall be willing to suspend the operation of that rule for the present session and secure that money to the pensioners. There is no disguising the true question we have to meet in this matter. I have no such great pride of opinion as to the correctness of the rules of the Senate. While I am willing to admit the general proposition that legislation upon appropriation bills is pernicious, yet I am not so great a stickler for our own rules that I am willing that they shall operate in every instance when I know that thereby great injustice is to be done, and done to a class of men that the Government of this country has been bound to make provision for.

To adhere to the rule is in my opinion virtually saying that from two to three million dollars of the appropriations for the pensioners in the bill now before the Senate shall be diverted from its legitimate object and put into the pockets of the claim agents around this city and throughout the country. When that alternative is presented to me, I will vote for the resolution of the Senator from Ohio or I will vote against the decision of the Chair that has been made in this case.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I think that we have exaggerated this question a great deal. The importance of prohibiting general legislation upon appropriation bills is certainly a general opinion of the Senate and of the country, but that the life of the Republic depends upon it, that a provision becomes bad which in itself is good because it comes upon an appropriation bill, there is no reason to believe; and the Constitution has happily provided against that. It has provided in the concurrence of the two Houses, in the veto of the President, in the responsibility of the Representatives to the people against hasty and indiscreet legislation; and these, and not the fact that it is upon a separate bill instead of an appropriation bill, are the great conservators of the country.

Why is it that when the House of Representatives send to us legislation, and we say we recognize the sovereign and independent right of that body to send it here, and to send it here upon an appropriation bill, we shall still say we will not consider it because of the manner in which it comes here, because we think the rule of the House that allows general legislation upon an appropriation bill is an improper rule? Why, sir, you can not acknowledge the independent and sovereign right of the House as to its own rules and as to the manner in which it shall send legislation here, and still say to it, "We will not consider it; we will not perform our constitutional duty of amending it, because of the manner in which you chose to send that legislation here."

It is manifest that the consent which the Constitution requires this body to give; or the refusal to consent to the legislation of the other House, refers to the merits of the proposition, and that we are expressly forbidden by the Constitution from refusing to consent to it because of the manner in which the House shall send it here. Because they see fit to send it upon a general aprpopriation bill, the Constitution expressly forbids us to refuse our concurrence in that legislation because of disapproval of the manner in which the House shall have sent it here, and confers upon them as upon us the sovereign right to send it upon an appropriation bill or any other bill or in any other way that they shall see fit; and it imposes upon us the duty of saying whether it is vicious legislation—not a vicious method—whether it will benefit the country or injure the country. That seems to me perfectly clear, and I am surprised that we should have any hesitation in arriving at a unanimous conclusion upon that subject.

I maintain, sir, that the House has a right to send legislation here upon appropriation bills, and that we have a constitutional duty to consider not the manner in which it is sent here, whether good or bad, but to consider whether it is proper legislation, whether its merits are such as to commend it to the country and will benefit the people. The independent right of the House to decide that they will send us general legislation on an appropriation bill, and the Senate's right to refuse to consider and amend it, can not coexist, because the Constitution clearly imposes on the Senate the duty to consider and amend or reject the legislation of the House, and not the rules of the House.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I do not wish to detain the Senate by debating this question any longer; but I have to vote on it, and I will vote against sustaining the judgment of the Chair, but in doing that I desire to explain that I am not adverse to the rule that the Senate has so long observed. I believe, with every Senator who has expressed himself this afternoon, that that rule is not only a very good one, but it is one that is necessary to preserve the constitutional rights of this people. But the difficulty about the rule of the Senate is not that it is too stringent, but that it is not sufficiently stringent. I wish to explain that remark.

A general appropriation bill comes from the House and it contains general legislation. It has been ruled by the Chair frequently, I think uniformly, that in order to get rid of that general legislation in the Senate you must move to strike it out and take the vote of the Senate upon it. That is the uniform ruling of the Chair.

The rule ought to be so framed as that it should be the duty of the Chair, or at least the right of a Senator, on motion, to strike out any general legislation that the House sends us on an appropriation bill; and in the amendment of our rules, instead of relaxing the rule so as to create exceptional cases we ought to strengthen it by making it the duty of the Chair to strike out upon motion of a Senator any matter of general legislation that is found on an appropriation bill. If we should take that course we would clear appropriation bills of all this kind of legislation, and they would stand as they were designed to be, the mere bills to apply the money of the people to ascertained legitimate subjects of appropriation.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLER, of California. There is a practical difficulty here. You strike out of an appropriation bill general legislation. Take the case now before the Senate, the pension bill. You strike out all the general legislation and pass the bill, and it goes back to the House. They disagree to the amendment of the Senate striking out, and then a conference is had, and the conferees are appointed. Has it not always been the custom of the Senate when it reaches that stage to recede from its position, so that practically when we strike out this legislation it gets back again through a conference? Is it not so in a majority of cases, and has it not been so generally?

Mr. ALLISON. Now I must interpose. I think the rule has been the other way. Of course conference committees have yielded, as in this case last year, but as a rule we have resisted as far as possible legislation on appropriation bills.

Mr. HALE. Was it not under the operation of this rule and under the operation of the construction of this very rule as given to it by different occupants of the chair that this vicious legislation did creep in last year?

Mr. ALLISON. It was placed there through a conference committee.

Mr. HALE. And that conference committee had a discretion allowed under our rules.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator from Alabama will allow me, I was on that conference committee——

Mr. MORGAN. I did not suppose I was raising such a disturbance on that side. Of course I will yield until it is ended.

Mr. DAWES. The matter is perfectly clear and apparent. The Senate struck out the entire legislation. The House non-concurred in the Senate amendment. The difference between the two Houses was submitted to a conference committee. One portion of the conference committee refused to adopt that legislation, and the other portion refused to take the bill without it, and the bill was pending in conference and reported back to the two bodies on disagreement several times until at last the two conference committees agreed that they would take the legislation now on the book in place of the legislation proposed by the House, and the result was that this legislation that now every one is satisfied was vicious was forced upon both Houses by the rules of the two Houses.

Mr. MORGAN. Not by the rules of the Senate.

Mr. DAWES. It was forced upon both Houses as the alternative of a loss of the pension appropriation bill.

Mr. MILLER, of California. And the Senate agreed to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama must not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I thought I had his consent.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator has my consent.

Mr. MILLER, of California. The point I was making to the Senator from Massachusetts was that the Senate sustained their conferees in their action on this matter and eventually yielded, and the conference committee was permitted to legislate for both Houses by the consent of both Houses. I say that is the practical result, and it does not make much difference what you do now, whether you stick to the rule you have or make another. The difficulty comes about in the way I have indicated.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from California is exactly right, in my opinion.

Mr. MORGAN. I am glad the Senators are agreed about it. This rule of course has been made the stalking-horse for a great many irregularities in legislation. I do not doubt that the Senate has perfect control of its committees of conference and can instruct them to any particular course that it may desire upon any bill that may be committed to their keeping. But I was not looking forward to what might be the results of an abuse by a committee of conference of the rules of the Senate or the indulgence on the part of the Senate of such abuse as its committee might see proper to make.

The question with me is just this: If I vote to sustain the Chair, do I vote to break down the rule of the Senate? I maintain that I do not. It may be called a relaxation of the rule; and if precedent were necessary to justify that relaxation I could go back in our history and find a great many, sometimes when the matter has gone on permissively and at other times when it has gone on by express consent of the Senate on its vote, for I remember frequent instances in which the Chair has been overruled on a ruling as to whether a particular measure was a measure included within the purview of our rule and was prohibited from going upon a bill.

This particular amendment is new legislation coming from the House. That everybody concedes. It is the ruling of the Chair, as I understand, that a question of order does not lie to the new legislation as presented in the bill sent to us from the House. To get rid of that legislation we must have an affirmative vote of the Senate to strike it out. Then the question arises whether the amendment now proposed is of the character of amendment denounced in the third clause of the sixteenth rule. I think it is not, for the reason that the legislation in respect of which that amendment is germane has been received by the Senate; and in proposing to amend what the House has put in and what the Senate has received and acted upon, we are not proposing new legislation in the sense of a violation of the Senate rule, but we are exercising a constitutional right and privilege in amending a bill that has been received by the Senate and is here the subject-matter of action, which bill, so sar as the parliamentary law is concerned, is open to every motion that any other bill is open to.

Here, then, is the new legislation proposed by the House before the Senate, having been received by it, being under consideration, and which will become a part of this measure unless it is stricken out. Finding it in this condition, the proposition under the sixteenth rule is to amend it, and the question is raised, you have no right to amend it, because in amending it you propose general legislation. My answer to that is, that it is not a proposition of general legislation within the meaning of the rule, but it is a proposition merely to amend a proposition that is lawfully before the Senate and upon which we have a full freedom of action, just as much so as if the bill had been reported in the Senate and was not amenable to any rule at all.

I merely desired to explain that in voting against sustaining the ruling of the Chair I do not wish to be understood as departing from this rule at all; on the contrary, instead of modifying the rule I would vote to strengthen the rule and make it more strict than it is by requiring the Chair, whenever legislation of a general character came to us from the House of Representatives, to strike it out, at least on the motion of a Senator.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. ["No!" "No!"] If a vote is to be taken I shall not insist on the motion.

Mr. HALE and others. Let us try for a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York withdraw his motion?

Mr. MILLER, or New York. I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair, holding this amendment not to be in order, stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask again that unanimous consent be given to entertaining and adopting the resolution I have offered. If any Senator objects to it, of course that is the end of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent to submit a resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. Let it be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That in the opinion of the Senate amendments may be made in the Senate pertinent and relevant to legislative provisions in a general appropriation bill as it comes from the House.

Mr. HARRIS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate upon the pending amendment to the pension appropriation bill?

Mr INGALLS called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. HARRIS. One single moment, Mr. President. There are two facts to be ascertained by the Chair in respect to this question of order. First, is the bill under consideration a general appropriation bill? That fact determined in the affirmative, next, is the amendment recommended by the committee general legislation?

If that fact be determined in the affirmative, it falls not only within the spirit but the very literalism of the rule, and it is out of order. That is all I desire to say.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 35, nays 23; as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, being the bill (H. R. 4976) for the retirement and recoinage of the trade-dollar.

The Senator from New York moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 10, 1885.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.
Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER.

Mr. ALLISON called the Senate to order, and the Secretary read the following letter:

To the Senate:

Pursuant to the rules, I hereby name and designate Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON, a Senator from the State of Iowa, to perform the duties of the Chair in my absence this day.

GEO. F. EDMUNDS,
President pro tempore.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 10, 1885.

Thereupon Mr. ALLISON took the chair as Presiding Officer.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ALLISON) laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a recommendation of the Supervising Architect to extend the limit of cost of the public buildings at Dallas, Tex., and Oxford, Miss.; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a report of recent explorations in Northern Alaska by Lieut. George M. Stoney, United States Navy; which, on motion of Mr. HARRISON, was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Territories.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER presented a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota, favoring the division of Dakota and the admission of the southern portion of that Territory as a State; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the New York Produce Exchange of the city of New York, in favor of such steps and appropriations as shall be requisite to place the chief city of the nation in wealth, population, and importance in a condition of safety, whatever foreign complications may arise; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, presented a petition of seamen of New York city, praying for the passage of the bill to amend the tenth section of the act to remove certain burdens from the American merchant marine; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of citizens of New York city, interested in the navigation of Lake Superior, praying for the passage of the bill providing for the acquisition by the United States of the Portage Lake Canal, so called; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WILSON. I present the petition of J. W. Sargent and 100 other citizens of Iowa, praying for the forfeitures of the unearned lands within the limits of the land grant to the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company. As the bill relating to that subject has been reported, I move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of D. W. Chamberlain and 47 other citizens of Iowa, and the petition of John O. Thompson and 50 other citizens of Iowa, praying for the forfeiture of the unearned lands within the limits of the land grant to the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of H. A. Lathrop, of Armada, Mich., praying to be reimbursed for property taken by the United States Government during the war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

MARGARET D. MARCHAND.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Reports of committees are in order, if there be no further petitions or memorials.

Mr. SEWELL. On the 6th of February the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] reported from the Committee on Pensions the bill (S. 957) granting a pension to Margaret D. Marchand with an amendment, and submitted a favorable report thereon. I find that it is marked on the Calendar as an adverse report. I ask to have the Calendar corrected. I call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire to it.

Mr. BLAIR. It should be marked "reported favorably with an amendment."

Mr. MITCHELL. I suggest to the Senator from New Jersey that the bill might be taken up and passed now, as it was really included in the order of the Senate the other day, and the Calendar was incorrectly printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 957) granting a pension to Margaret D. Marchand. Is there objection?

Mr. JACKSON. Is there not an adverse report in that case?

Mr. MITCHELL. There was no adverse report. It was a favorable report, and it was improperly placed upon the Calendar as an adverse report. It comes within the order of the Senate the other day in regard to the consideration of pension bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the majority report was an adverse report, and therefore the bill was placed upon the Calendar accordingly.

Mr. BLAIR. That is a mistake. The Chair has been misinformed. It is a House bill granting a pension to this lady at the rate of $50 per month, reported favorably by the Senate Committee on Pensions with an amendment reducing the rate from $50 to $30. So it becomes a favorable report with an amendment. It is not strange that it was understood to be an adverse report, because it is one of that class of cases on which we have had controversy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none, and it is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Margaret D. Marchand, widow of Commodore J. B. Marchand, late of the United States Navy, and pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month from the date of the passage of this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment reported from the Committee on Pensions will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 8 strike out "fifty" before the word "dollars" and insert "thirty;" so as to read:

At the rate of $30 per month.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. I think the attention of the Senate ought to be called to this bill, because it is an important one. This bill, rather inadvertently brought before the Senate, is of too much importance to be disposed of in the hurried manner that it seems likely to be, and therefore I ask the attention of the Senate while I state what it is.

It is a bill of the same class as those upon which the Senate had a somewhat closely contested discussion at the last session. It proposes to pension the widow of a rear-admiral of the Navy who rendered very distinguished service to his country during half a century of time, if I remember correctly. The report sets forth fully the facts. The bill was passed by the House, giving her a pension at the rate of $50, which has come to be perhaps the settled practice of Congress in such cases. It was referred to the Senate Committee on Pensions, who reported it favorably to the extent of $30—that is, with an amendment reducing the amount proposed by the House to $30.

The real controversy that is pertinent to this and to some ten or twelve other cases of like character now pending upon the Calendar of the Senate is whether the Senate will give to this lady the additional $20 which has been voted by the House. It is important not alone on account of the propriety, to say the least, of treating all these ladies with some consistency, but because there are pending ten or twelve cases at the present time, and whatever principle is adopted by the Senate in disposing of this case will be very naturally followed in the others.

I do not wish to reopen the discussion upon this class unless others should see fit to do so, because the discussion has already been very full and I could add no new light to the matter. It is as it was at the last session, save only that by a very emphatic vote of the Senate in all the cases which were called to its attention the previous precedents have been greatly strengthened.

Mr. PLUMB. I should like to inquire what is the order of business now under the consideration of the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania asked unanimous consent that this pension bill be considered at this time, which was granted.

Mr. PLUMB. What is the order of business in the morning hour?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Reports of committees.

Mr. PLUMB. I object to the further consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made, and the bill goes over. Reports of committees are now in order.

Mr. BLAIR. As this bill was called up hurriedly, I wish to correct a statement I made. I am informed that it is a Senate bill. Some of these bills pending before the committee are from the House; but two or three were introduced originally in the Senate. I may have been mistaken as to this one having passed the House, but quite a number of others being exactly similar to it have passed that body, so that the principle involved is the same.

Mr. PLATT obtained the floor.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask unanimous consent to have the correction made and the adverse report stricken from the Calendar opposite the bill

Mr. JACKSON. That is improper. It was an adverse report of the majority of the committee, and the views of the minority were presented by the Senator from New Hampshire. The bill is reported adversely so far as a pension at the rate of $50 a month is proposed in the bill.

Mr. BLAIR. The report is adverse so far as the additional $20 are concerned, and favorable so far as the $30 are concerned. The bill should be marked as "reported favorably with an amendment."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair finds in the RECORD of February 7 the following:

Mr. BLAIR. By direction of the Committee on Pensions I also report adversely the bill (S. 957) granting a pension to Margaret D. Marchand, recommending its indefinite postponement. I submit also with the report the views of the minority favoring the passage of the bill. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

That is the record.

Mr. BLAIR. That is precisely correct. I have a recollection now in regard to it that the bill was rejected in toto; it was not sanctioned at all by the committee. The report as stated in the RECORD is precisely correct. My statement at the time, in the ordinary way in which these cases have come before the committee, should have been that the report was favorable so far as $30 per month was concerned; but in this case the committee rejected the bill in toto—that is to say, they did not allow a pension in any degree.

I ought to say, further, that this was called to my attention by the Senator from Pennsylvania and the case called up, which I supposed was somewhat under my own charge, in such a way that my recollection was a little obtuse. The bill was in my mind, however, and the case would have been taken care of at what I should have considered a proper season.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to say a word.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] has been recognized by the Chair.

Mr. PLATT. Let me have my say first.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the question pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] has been recognized. The Chair does not know for what purpose he rises.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask, for parliamentary information, what is the pending question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Reports of standing and select committees.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to make a report from the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PLATT. Have I the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has recognized the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to say, if I may be permitted, that it seems to me the matter which we have been considering, having come up under the circumstances in which it has, ought not to go over into the Calendar under the ninth rule, but it ought to be passed over without prejudice. I trust the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], who objected to the further consideration of the bill, will have no objection to that course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut asks that the bill may be placed on the Calendar under the eighth rule, without prejudice.

Mr. PLUMB. The purpose of my objection was simply that we might go on with the morning business. I have no objection to the bill being placed exactly where it was before it was brought to the attention of the Senate in this irregular manner this morning.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire what is the rule about it. I understand that unanimous consent was given to taking up the bill; the Chair asked for it, and two or three Senators spoke to it. Can an objection be interposed now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that an objection can be interposed at any time.

Mr. HOAR. Under the eighth rule?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. So the Chair understands.

Mr. HOAR. I understood that the bill was taken up by unanimous consent at the time of morning business, before reports of committees were concluded, not under the eighth rule, and that unanimous consent would give the measure its right, and no objection could remove it.

Mr. MITCHELL. That was my understanding of the case. However, I do not care for it; but as many mistakes have been made in regard to this matter, I think it due to myself that I should state what I understand to be the facts in regard to it.

In the first place, I did not ask for unanimous consent. I suggested to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] that it would be a proper case to consider at this time, inasmuch as by my understanding it came within the rule which was adopted in the Senate the other day for the consideration of pension bills. My recollection in regard to the report is entirely different from that now stated by the Senator from New Hampshire. My recollection is that the committee did agree to report in favor of granting a pension of $30 a month in this case, and I think the report so shows. However, I think the bill may as well go over and come up regularly hereafter. I do not desire to press it, and I had no such desire at the time I made the suggestion.

Mr. WILSON. If the Senator from Pennsylvania will yield to me I wish to make a statement. The action of the committee, according to my recollection of the case, was based upon the fact that we had no information before us that an application had been made for the allowance of a pension.

Mr. BLAIR. No application to the Pension Office?

Mr. WILSON. No application had been made to the Commissioner of Pensions; and while a majority of the committee, I may say all the members according to my present recollection, were in favor of the allowance of a pension at the rate of $30 a month, still a portion of the committee desired that the application should be made to the Commissioner of Pensions in order that we might have the record from the Pension Office, and it was on that basis that the committee acted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Reports of standing and select committees are now in order.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7496) for the relief of Wehrle, Werk & Son, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SLATER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1877) granting an increase of pension to John Hall, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1739) granting a pension to the widow and children of the late Byram Pitney, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following petitions, reported adversely thereon; and their prayer was denied:

Petition of John G. Burchfield, of Illinois, praying for a pension; and Petition of Edward Kelly, of Maine, praying for a pension.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon, which were agreed to; and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

Mr. CAMDEN. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1995) granting a pension to John R. Hurd, to submit an adverse report thereon. The relief asked for in the bill has been granted in the Pension Office. I therefore move that the bill be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

Petition of Margaret F. Rawdon, of Little Falls, N. Y., praying the passage of the resolution referring the controversy between the United States and Venezuela, in respect to the awards of the mixed commission, to the President.

Mr. LAPHAM. The joint resolution which I have reported simply provides for the distribution of the Venezuela award as it lies in the State Department, amounting to about half a million dollars, while these petitioners and various other claimants are kept out of their money. There is a similar measure pending in the House. I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution. I think there can be no objection to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that it be read for information first.

Mr. LAPHAM. Certainly.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution and the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. HARRIS. I think it had better go over and be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

A bill (H. R. 5762) for the relief of Ann Lumphrey.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2568) granting a pension to Mrs. Adeline E. Chadbourne, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5798) granting a pension to John E. Denham, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 691) for the relief of William W. Thomas, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4280) to increase the pension of Mrs. Martha C. Breese, to report it adversely, with the views of the minority recommending the passage of the bill. I ask that it be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania reports adversely the bill named by him. It will be placed on the Calendar. The Senator also submits the views of the minority. If there be no objection they will be received and printed.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 4266) granting a pension to Margaret A. Ringwalt;

A bill (S. 2245) granting a pension to William N. Morris; and

A bill (H. R. 6966) granting a pension to Wealthy H. Seavey.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon, which were ageeed to; and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (H. R. 2522) granting a pension to John Q. Bellville; and

A bill (H. R. 765) for the relief of Emily Agnel.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am also instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1079) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Emily M. Wyman, to submit an adverse report thereon, and the views of the minority in favor of the passage of the bill. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar. In this case the Secretary of the Navy recommended the passage of the bill to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator submits the views of the minority. If there be no objection they will be received and ordered to be printed. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

WASHINGTON MONUMENT MEDALS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2615) to authorize medals commemorating the completion and dedication of the Washington Monument, to report it favorably with an amendment. If the bill is to be passed at this session it ought to be passed now; and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ALLISON in the chair). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information, and then we can tell.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] suggests that I should make a statement in regard to the bill.

It has been customary not only in this country but in all countries to commemorate any event in their history that they think important. Congress passed a somewhat similar resolution authorizing medals in commemoration of the laying of the corner-stone of the Washington Monument. The Monument Commission believe that the completion and dedication of the monument is an event that ought to be commemorated by the most enduring memorial in the world, a coin or medal. Coins have survived. Indeed the evidence of the appearance, character, nature, and qualities of the Romans and Grecians is better preserved in their medals than in any other way. It is usual with all nations to commemorate any important event in national history in this way.

The dies provided by the bill can be made at an expense of about $500, and then anybody can get a medal at cost. I am told, coming from the Director of the Mint, that the medals will cost from thirty to forty cents apiece, so that it is not a matter of much expense; and the medals will no doubt be purchased by people not only in our day but, as the die will be kept, the medals will be perpetuated and increased to the extent that there may be a demand for them.

The only doubt I have about the bill (and I wonder that some Senators have not called attention to it) is that it provides for one medal for each member of Congress. I should rather have that provision out, because we are able to buy these things. But that is not an unusual provision, and it is supposed members of Congress will place them in some library or some receptacle where they will be perpetuated and preserved.

That is the object of the bill, and I believe it is an object approved by all nations. England and France especially have in their galleries of medals a very remarkable display of skill. The Romans were also very celebrated for their medals, not only to commemorate events, but to perpetuate the faces and names of heroes and statesmen.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is reported with an amendment which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Committee on Finance report to amend the bill after the word "reverse," in line 7, by striking out "an exact" and inserting "a;" so as to read:

That to commemorate the completion and dedication of the Washington Monument, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to have prepared, at the mint at Philadelphia, medals, not less than four inches in diameter, bearing on one side the head of George Washington and on the reverse a representation of the Washington Monument, with suitable devices to be approved by the Secretary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary may have leave hereafter to sit during the daily sessions of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves that for the remainder of this session the Committee on the Judiciary have leave to sit during the sittings of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

MARIA SYPHAX.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask unanimous consent to take up——

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator yield a moment? I have a report to make. I did not hear the close of that order of business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive the report.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report favorably the bill (S. 2342) declaratory of the meaning of the act entitled "An act for the relief of Maria Syphax," and I beg to ask the Senate for its immediate consideration. I think it will be granted if I can be allowed thirty seconds to state the purpose of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It declares the act of June 12, 1866, "for the relief of Maria Syphax," releasing and confirming to her, her heirs and assigns, the title to a piece of land therein described, being part of the Arlington estate, in the county of Alexandria, Virginia, shall be construed to operate as a relinquishment of any outstanding title which the United States may have acquired since the date of that act.

Mr. HAWLEY. As there has not been time since I had my instructions to report this bill to draft a written report, allow me to place on the record a very brief statement.

Maria Syphax was a favored servant of the Custis family on the famous Arlington estate. The family allotted her a little house and piece of ground. The United States afterward acquired the tax title, as everybody knows, to the whole estate. During that time while the United States claimed to have this title it passed the act of June 12, 1866, now before me, confirming to this favored old servant this piece of ground. The Supreme Court afterward decided that the United States themselves had no title to any part of the estate. Since that decision the United States has acquired a full title to the property by negotiation and purchase. Now the United States is asked simply to reaffirm its act of 1866, that the old woman 80 years of age, a favored old servant, may have the piece of ground the Custis family originally intended she should have. The Government yielded it to her once, supposing it had a perfect title, but now the claimant is advised that there ought to be a confirmatory act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move to amend the title by inserting after the word "act" the words "of June 12, 1866;" so as to read: "A bill declaratory of the meaning of the act of June 12, 1866, entitled 'An act for the relief of Maria Syphax.'"

The amendment was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT FORT WAYNE.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President——

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask the Senator from Nebraska to be kind enough to yield to me to pass a bill of purely local importance, but the necessity for which is pressing. The bill was reported last session unanimously by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. It is Order of Business 871, Senate bill 2084.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. VAN WYCK. Yes, sir, I yield; though I suppose the bill I have in charge will not take long.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 871, being the bill (S. 2084) to amend chapter 464 of the acts of the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress, entitled "An act to provide for a public building at the city of Fort Wayne, in the State of Indiana."

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to increase the limitation from $100,000 to $175,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President——

Mr. PIKE. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. VAN WYCK. If I can do so without seeming to be intruding on the Senate.

Mr. PLUMB. Let me say that I think it would better subserve the convenience of the Senate to go on and finish the bill in charge of the Senator from Nebraska. It will take but a moment, and I wish to say for myself that I want to be here when it is passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the duty of the Chair to say that debate is not in order. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. COCKRELL. I rise to a point of order, and that is whether one Senator can take the floor and then farm out the business of the Senate to others? I object to that mode of doing business.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I shall have to go on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the point of order of the Senator from Missouri is well taken if the state of the case would warrant it as a matter of fact. The Chair only thought, according to the usual courtesy of the Senate, that it was his duty to recognize the Senator from Nebraska in preference to any one else.

UNLAWFUL OCCUPANCY OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I move the consideration of Calendar number 993, being the bill (H. R. 5479) to prevent unlawful occupancy of the public lands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Nebraska.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the amendments be engrossed and the bill read a third time? But it is still open to amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. At the time the consideration of this bill was concluded yesterday the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] had made a suggestion in regard to an amendment to the first section. While I did not think then and do not now think that is necessary, at the same time, to make more specific the meaning of this section, I will move to add in line 10, after the word "faith," the words "with a view to entry thereof;" so as to read:

Or an asserted right thereto by or under claim made in good faith with a view to entry thereof at the proper land office.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VEST. I ask the Senator in charge of the bill as to the language used in lines 10 and 11 of section 2, where it is provided:

And the persons guilty of the violation as nearly as may be, and by description if the name can not on reasonable inquiry be ascertained, to institute a civil suit in the proper United States district or circuit court.

Under the Constitution the Territorial courts are not United States courts. Every lawyer understands that the language here used would confine jurisdiction over these proceedings to the district or circuit courts of the United States, which are not in the Territories at all. I would suggest an amendment to cover this point: In line 11 of section 2 say "the proper United States district or circuit or Territorial district court," because the evil that this bill seeks to remedy is in the Territories where the district and circuit courts have no jurisdiction.

Mr. VAN WYCK. There is no objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 2, line 11, after the word "court" it is proposed to insert "or Territorial district court;" so as to read:

To institute a civil suit in the proper United States district or circuit court or Territorial district court.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to this amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VEST. In line 15 of the same section the same amendment will follow as a matter of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri moves to insert after the word "court," in line 15 of section 2, the words "or Territorial district court."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VEST. In section 3, I desire to call the attention of the Senator having charge of this bill to the rather uncertain and nebulous language used in the proviso. Section 3 provides:

That no person, by force, threats, intimidation, or by any fencing or inclosure, or any other unlawful means, shall prevent or obstruct or shall combine and confederate with others to prevent or obstruct any person from peaceably entering upon or establishing a settlement or residence on any tract of public land subject to settlement or entry under the public-land laws of the United States, or shall prevent or obstruct free passage or transit over or through the public lands.

Now the proviso reads:

Provided, This section shall not apply to persons who have gone upon, improved, or occupied said lands under the land laws of the United States, claiming title thereto in good faith.

As a matter of course a person who has gone on the public lands under a color of title or with an honest claim under the laws of the United States is not likely to confederate and with violence or by unlawful means prevent other persons from coming there. I suggest that the proviso be modified to read as follows:

Provided, That this section shall not be held to affect the right or title of persons who have gone on, improved, or occupied said lands.

I understand the meaning of the proviso to be to protect honest bona fide settlers who have gone on the public lands claiming a homestead or pre-emption right.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Does the Senator think the phraseology there used does not meet the case suggested?

Mr. VEST. Yes. Suppose that should go into court for legal construction. Are you to hold that it means that persons who go there claiming homesteads and pre-emptions should have the right by force, intimidation, or unlawful means to keep off other people? I take it the committee means that the right or title under the land laws of the United States of the honest bona fide pre-emption or homestead settler shall not be affected by this legislation. That I suppose is the meaning.

Mr. VAN WYCK. That is the intention, and I think the language would give that meaning. If the Senator thinks he can make it clear, I shall be happy to accept the amendment.

Mr. VEST. I am a friend of the bill; I want it to pass; but I should like it to pass without danger of litigation hereafter in regard to these terms.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Will the Senator repeat his amendment?

Mr. VEST. Strike out in line 9 of section 3, after the word "not," the words "apply to" and insert "be held to affect the right or title of."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 3, line 9, after the word "not," it is proposed to strike out the words "apply to" and insert "be held to affect the right or title of;" so as to read:

Provided, This section shall not be held to affect the right or title of persons who have gone upon, improved, or occupied said lands.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

EDWAY A. GRANT.

Mr. PIKE. I desire to call up Order of Business 733, being the bill (S. 1972) for the relief of Edway A. Grant, not for the purpose of asking its passage, but to move its indefinite postponement.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. PIKE. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed. The reason of this is, that since the Committee on Claims reported the bill favorably I am informed by the claimant that his claim has been adjusted at the Post-Office Department, and he does not desire further action. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PIKE. I offer the following order for returning the papers to the claimant:

Ordered, That Edway A. Grant have leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate the papers relating to his claim.

The order was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I gave notice yesterday that I should ask the Senate to-day to take up and consider in consecutive order the House bills reported favorably by the Senate committees. I stated yesterday that there were only forty-nine of these bills on the Calendar. One has been passed this morning, which leaves only forty-eight. I have looked over them all, and I am satisfied that the unobjected cases will possibly not occupy much longer than an hour and a half or two hours. I think we can finish nearly all the unobjected cases in one morning. It will be a great relief to all the Senators to have this done.

Mr. HARRIS. Consider them under Rule VIII?

Mr. COCKRELL. Consider them under Rule VIII, whereby one objection will carry a bill over.

Mr. BLAIR. What is the first number? Can the Senator give us the first Calendar number?

Mr. COCKRELL. It is on page 11 of the Calendar. I have all of them marked.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent that House bills on the Calendar be taken up in their order and be considered as under Rule VIII. Is there objection?

Mr. WILSON. I object to that.

Mr. McMILLAN. The proposition, I understand, was to take up the case subject to objection. A single objection would then put them over.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Certainly; the Senator from Missouri asks that they be taken up under Rule VIII, and under Rule VIII a single objection puts a bill over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But under Rule VIII the Senate by a majority can proceed with the consideration of any bill that is objected to. Does the Senator from Missouri intend to have that part of the rule apply, or only to take up bills not subject to objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. Subject to discussion under five minutes' debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WILSON and others objected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the Senator from Iowa who has risen will proceed.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to state in this connection that on the 19th day of March, 1884, the Committee on Public Lands reported a bill (S. 1886) to quiet title of settlers on the Des Moines River lands, in the State of Iowa, and for other purposes. That bill has now won its way to the head of the Calendar, under Rule VIII, and it has occupied that position for some time. It has given away now and then from time to time on the request of Senators, until it is growing so late in the session that it will be almost impossible to expect favorable action in the House of Representatives should it pass the Senate, unless it be acted on now; and, therefore, until some disposition is made of that bill, I must object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made. The Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is the Calendar under Rule VIII.

FOREIGN-LABOR CONTRACTS.

Mr. BLAIR. I move that the Senate now proceed to consider Order of Business 863, being the bill (H. R. 2550) to prohibit the importation and migration of foreigners and aliens under contract or agreement to perform labor in the United States, its Territories, and the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. BLAIR. I withdraw the motion, as I am informed——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. BLAIR. Is it in order to withdraw the motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask unanimous consent to give my reason for so doing.

Mr. PLUMB and Mr. COCKRELL. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the Senator from New Hampshire can not proceed. The motion is withdrawn. The Calendar under Rule VIII is before the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the regular order.

PUBLIC LAND LAWS.

Mr. DOLPH. I move to take up Order of Business 1001, being House bill 7004, which has been partly considered by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 1001, being the bill (H. R. 7004) to repeal all laws providing for the pre-emption of the public lands and the laws allowing entries for timber culture. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. COCKRELL. And I join you.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order. On this question the yeas and nays are called for. Is there a second?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Chair state the question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Oregon that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 1001, being House bill 7004, on which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 15, nays 36; as follows:

EFFICIENCY OF THE ARMY.

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Order of Business 394, being the bill (S. 1420) to increase the efficiency of the Army of the United States, will now be laid before the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I object to its consideration. The Senator who reported it is not present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over.

DES MOINES RIVER LANDS.

The bill (S. 1886) to quiet title of settlers on the Des Moines River lands, in the State of Iowa, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill has been read and the reading of the report was called for. The Secretary will resume the reading of the report of the Committee on Public Lands where it was suspended on a former occasion.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the report, submitted by Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, April 8, 1884.

Mr. LAPHAM. I ask the Secretary at what page he is reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. About the middle of page 16. The reading will proceed.

The Secretary resumed and continued the reading of the report till 1 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill (H. R. 4976) for the retirement and recoinage of the trade-dollar.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask unanimous consent that the special order may be laid aside so that the report in this case, the reading of which has now been nearly completed, may be concluded, in order that at the next sitting of the Senate when the bill comes up the bill itself may be considered.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the Senator from New York [Mr. LAPHAM] will forego the further reading of the report. Manifestly it is a bare consumption of time; nobody is paying any attention to the reading of it; and I do not think we have any time to waste in this way. I hope the consumption of further time in reading a document that all of us are familiar with will not be insisted on by the Senator from New York.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the pending order be laid aside informally until the Secretary concludes the reading of the report. Is there objection?

Mr. LAPHAM. I object.

COINAGE OF SILVER DOLLARS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the bill (H. R. 4976) for the retirement and recoinage of the trade-dollar is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] to amend the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance by striking out section 5 of the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not see the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] who is entitled to the floor in his seat at this moment, and I ask that the bill be passed over, to be taken up to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the special order be laid aside informally, in order that the reading of the report in the Des Moines River bill may be completed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is not in order.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to lay the pending order aside until to-morrow. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] does not appear to be in his seat.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the pending bill be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senate now to finish the pension appropriation bill.

Mr. PLUMB. I move, if the Senator from Iowa will withdraw his motion for that purpose——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state the question. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7785) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7785) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole will be reported.

The SECRETARY. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, in section 1, line 34, before the word "agents," struck out "twelve" and inserted "eighteen;" and in line 35, after the word "each," struck out "forty-eight" and inserted "seventy-two;" so as to read:

For the salaries of eighteen agents for the payment of pensions, at $4,000 each, $72,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, in section 1, after the word "dollars," in line 36, to strike out the following clause:

And from and after July 1, 1885, there shall be no more than twelve agents for the payment of pensions, and it shall be the duty of the President, and he is hereby authorized and directed, to reduce the pension agents to not exceeding the number aforesaid; and so much of section 4778 and 4780 as is in conflict with this provision be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I raise the point of order that in the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations there is general legislation and can not be entertained.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order on the ground that the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriation takes legislation out of the bill, instead of leaving it in. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, in section 1, line 44, after the word "lights," to strike out "and;" in line 46, after the word "pensioners," to insert "stationery, and other necessary expenses, to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior;" and before "thousand," in line 48, to strike out "fifty-three" and insert "fifty-six;" so as to read:

For fees for preparing vouchers, rent, fuel, lights, postage on letters to the Executive Departments and to pensioners, stationery, and other necessary expenses, to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, $256,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, in section 1, line 48, after the word "after," to strike out "March 4" and insert "June 30;" and after the word "available," at the end of line 55, to strike out:

And hereafter the mode and manner provided by law and regulations for the payment of white persons entitled to pensions shall apply to and govern the payment of all pensioners.

So as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That from and after June 30, 1885, the salary and emoluments of agents for the payment of pensions shall be $4,000, and no more, per annum; and of the fees provided by law for vouchers prepared and paid, only so much thereof as may be required for expenses incurred in having said vouchers prepared, as well as the necessary clerical work at the agencies, shall be available.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was to strike out lines 59 and 60, as follows:

For contingent expenses of pension agencies, $3,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was to strike out section 2, in the following words:

SEC. 2. That no agent, attorney, or other person shall demand or receive any fee for his services in pension, arrears of pension, or bounty-land claims until the allowance of the claim.

Mr. ALLISON. The striking out of all the sections from section 2 to the end of the bill is one amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. It ought to be read.

Mr. ALLISON. It has been read through; it was read through in Committee of the Whole. I suppose the Senator may require another reading, but it was read through in Committee of the Whole yesterday.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senate was not full yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that although all the sections from 2 to 10, both inclusive, are stricken out, the striking out of each section is an amendment of itself, and therefore the Chair will be bound to put the question on striking out each section. The question is on the amendment of the Committee of the Whole striking out section 2, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read section 2, as follows:

SEC. 2. That no agent, attorney, or other person shall demand or receive any fee for his services in pension, arrears of pension, or bounty-land claims until the allowance of the claim.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] expressed a desire to take the sense of the Senate on some of these legislative provisions. The bill came up suddenly without his knowledge, and he, supposing the regular order would go on, is not present. I have no objection to having these sections laid over. It is but fair he should be present. I know he desires to retain some of these sections, but I am not familiar with his views on the subject. I know he wishes to raise the question.

Mr. DAWES. I understood the Senator from Kansas wished to test the sense of the Senate on the legislation in the bill, but that question was determined yesterday. I construe the vote of the Senate yesterday as a determination to strike but and not amend the legislation in the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. The very first legislative section in the bill provides:

SEC. 2. That no agent, attorney, or other person shall demand or receive any fee for his services in pension, arrears of pension, or bounty-land claims until the allowance of the claim.

I believe that was the old law until it was repealed at the last session.

Mr. ALLISON. Though not the law now, it was the law up to 1878 from the beginning, I believe, of the pension legislation. In 1878 the fee was reduced in all cases to $10, and an attorney could collect the fee at any time; but in 1884 the legislation on the pension appropriation bill provided that no attorney's fee should be paid except out of the claim. So this is a re-enactment of the law as it stands now, so far as section 2 is concerned.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] is now present. He and the chairman of the Committee on Pensions are much more familiar with these provisions than I am. The Senator from Kansas desired to raise some question on the legislative provisions of the bill. He can now do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was to strike out section 3, in the following words:

SEC. 3. That all fees in pension claims shall be paid by the agent for paying pensions out of the first installment of pension due the claimant; and no agent, attorney, or other persons shall receive any fee for his services in a pension claim, except through the agent for paying pensions.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was to strike out section 4, in the following words:

SEC. 4. That the fee in all pension, arrears of pension, or bounty-land claims shall be $10, except in cases of special written contract, filed in the Pension Office and approved by the Commissioner of Pensions, as hereinafter provided. The claimant may contract with his attorney of record, in writing, in such form as the Commissioner of Pensions may prescribe, for a fee to an amount not exceeding $25, except in claims for increase of pension where no new disability is alleged, in cases of pensions for service, and in all claims filed in the Pension Office after June 28, 1878, and prior to the 4th day of July, 1884, in which cases no fee above $10 shall be contracted for; and in all claims filed prior to the passage of this act the attorney shall file a statement, under oath, duly attested, setting forth the amount of fee already received by him, and the amount already received shall be deducted from the fee allowed by this act.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was to strike out section 5, as follows:

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe rules and regulations governing the recognition of agents, attorneys, or other persons representing claimants before his Department, and may require of such persons, agents, and attorneys, before being recognized as representatives of claimants, that they shall show that they are of good moral character and in good repute, possessed of the necessary qualifications to enable them to render such claimants valuable service and otherwise competent to advise and assist such claimants in the presentation of their cases; and such Secretary may suspend, debar, dismiss, and disbar from further practice before his Department any such person, agent, or attorney shown to be incompetent, disreputable, or who refuses to abide by the said rules and regulations, or who shall in any manner deceive, mislead, or threaten any claimant or presumptive claimant by word, circular, letter, or by advertisement.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was to strike out section 6, as follows:

SEC. 6. That any agent or attorney or other person instrumental in prosecuting any claim for pension, or arrears thereof, who shall directly or indirectly contract for, demand, or receive and retain any compensation for his services or instrumentality for prosecuting a claim for pension, or arrears thereof, greater than is herein provided, or in any other manner than herein provided, or shall willfully or knowingly make a false statement in regard to the amount of fee already received, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall for every such offense be fined not exceeding $1,000, or be confined at hard labor not exceeding two years, or both, at the discretion of the court, and be forever afterward debarred from practicing before the Pension Office.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was to strike out section 7, as follows:

SEC. 7. That no agent or attorney shall either demand or receive, on account of the prosecution of any claim provided for under the provisions of this act, where such claim was filed after the 28th day of June, 1878, and prior to the 4th day of July, 1884, any fee or sum of money in excess of $10; nor shall said $10, or any part thereof, be paid to any agent or attorney until he make and file in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions the affidavit provided for in section 4 of this act; and if it shall appear from said affidavit, or in any other way, that all or any part of said $10 has been paid, it shall be deducted therefrom, and the residue, if any, shall be paid to such attorney as hereinbefore provided: Provided, That this act shall not be so construed as to interfere with any contracts, entered into fairly and without fraud or duress, for the prosecution of claims filed after the 4th day of July, 1884, and prior to the passage of this act; and that any person who shall violate the provisions of this act shall be, upon conviction, punished as provided in the sixth section of this act.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was to strike out section 8, as follows:

SEC. 8. That this act shall not be so construed as to prohibit any claimant the prosecution of whose claim has been heretofore abandoned by his attorney from employing another attorney or agent, but in no such case shall the fee paid such attorney exceed the sum of $10, under the penalties of the sixth section of this act: Provided, That if such new attorney successfully prosecute such claim, that the original attorney or agent shall not be allowed to demand or receive any part thereof, under the penalties of the sixth section of this act.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was to strike out section 9, as follows:

SEC. 9. That hereafter no person or persons who may have been heretofore engaged in the prosecution of pension or bounty-land claims of any character whatsoever, and who may have heretofore collected on account thereof any sum whatever, shall be allowed to sell, assign, convey, or make over to any other person any such claim or claims, so as that it shall be lawful for any vendee or assignee of such claim or claims to demand or receive any other or greater fee than is hereinbefore provided for; nor shall such vendee or assignee be allowed to receive anything therefor until the vendor or assignor of such claim or claims, if alive, shall make and file in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions the affidavit provided for in the fourth section of this act; and any person or persons who shall violate the provisions of this section shall be subject to the penalties imposed by the sixth section of this act: Provided, That the provisions of this act authorizing contracts for a fee of $25 shall be limited to attorneys or agents residing in the State where the claimant resides, and shall not extend to agents or attorneys in the District of Columbia; and it shall be unlawful for any agent or attorney residing in a State of which the claimant is resident to enter into partnership with or otherwise to divide the fee of $25 with any attorney or agent residing in the District of Columbia.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was to strike out section 10, as follows:

SEC. 10. That all the provisions of the act making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, approved July 4, 1884, relating to claim agents and attorneys in pension cases, are hereby repealed: Provided, That as to offenses committed under said act all the provisions thereof shall remain in full force.

The amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is still open to amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. I understand that the Senate by its action yesterday resolved upon the subject of general legislation upon general appropriation bills to be hereafter virtuous; that there should be no more cakes nor ale, and that ginger should not be hot in the mouth. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, whether he regards the action of the Senate yesterday, as expressing the sense of this body, binding upon that committee that hereafter there shall be no legislation admitted upon these bills?

Mr. ALLISON. I certainly regard the action of the Senate yesterday as requiring the Committee on Appropriations as well as the Senate to observe the rule as it was interpreted. While, of course, I can not speak for all the members of the Committee on Appropriations as to how they may vote upon special questions, for myself I believe the Committee on Appropriations practically to be instructed to report these bills without legislation.

Mr. INGALLS. And that there is to be no surrender in committees of conference? I ask whether the instruction goes that far?

Mr. ALLISON. I can only speak for myself, as I say.

Mr. INGALLS. Speaking as the organ of the committee.

Mr. ALLISON. For myself I regard the action of yesterday as requiring a committee of conference on the part of the Senate not to report legislation here without the instructions of the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. And that the conference committees are to adhere to the instructions even if the appropriation bill should fail?

Mr. ALLISON. They would, of course, in that event probably take the advice of the Senate. I certainly would not undertake to force an extra session of Congress by the failure of appropriation bills without taking the advice of the Senate. But I repeat that as a member of a conference committee, if the presiding officer of this body should ever appoint me upon such a committee, I should not feel, after the vote of yesterday, that I was permitted to agree to legislation upon appropriation bills.

Mr. INGALLS. Without further order from the Senate?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes.

Mr. INGALLS. There appears to have been some discrimination exercised by the Committee on Appropriations in their report upon this bill. Some of the general legislation that came to us from the House of Representatives has been stricken out; other of that legislation the committee have allowed to stand. I am unable to see why, if the rule is to be applied, it should not be applied uniformly. I will, therefore, ask the Senator from Iowa, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, whether the matter contained upon page 2, from line 18, after the word "dollars" to and including the word "made" in line 29, is not general legislation?

Mr. ALLISON. I will state to the Senator from Kansas that it was not so regarded by the committee. It is open, I think, however, to the criticism of the Senator from Kansas, inasmuch as the word "hereafter" is inserted in line 18. If that word should be stricken out, the provision would in no sense be legislation. It is a mere regulation of the appropriation of $500,000 for fees and expenses of examining surgeons.

Mr. INGALLS. Let me ask the Senator if the proviso from lines 23 to 29 is not general legislation?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not so regard it. It is a mere regulation as to how the appropriation of $500,000 shall be expended.

Mr. INGALLS. Is not the proviso which closes the paragraph, from lines 29 to 33, general legislation?

Mr. ALLISON. That might be so construed, although it is claimed by many good lawyers that that is the law now. But I will say to the Senator from Kansas that although that is general legislation, for one I was not willing to report the bill with that provision stricken out.

Mr. INGALLS. That is, the Senator thought it was valuable and necessary legislation, and therefore preferred to leave it in.

Mr. ALLISON. No, sir; not precisely that. The Senate has twice passed that provision as a bill separately. Of course the Committee on Appropriations could report to strike it out, or any Senator could move to strike it out. If the Senator from Kansas thinks it ought not to be in the bill, he can now move to strike it out. I do not myself regard that clause as a change of existing law.

Mr. INGALLS. It is a change of existing law although it is not a change of existing practice in the Pension Office. Of course it seems inequitable and unjust that the Government after having mustered a soldier, subjecting him to the most rigid examination, should be allowed, when he applied for a pension, to say that he was not sound when he was enlisted. After having accepted his services, it appears as though the Government should be estopped from denying his soundness or his capacity to serve.

Upon inquiry at the Pension Office the other day, I was informed by the Commissioner that the law is now practically interpreted in that way, but that it is necessary that there should be a discretion left in the pension examining officers for the reason that certain disabilities might have existed at the time of offered enlistment which did not render the man unsound within the purview of the law. That is to say, the loss of the left eye did not render a man incompetent to be mustered; the loss of a little finger was not such a disability as rendered him incapable of being mustered. Therefore, if the soldier now applied for a pension upon the ground of loss of left eye or of little finger he ought to be compelled to show that those disabilities were incurred in the service after his enlistment and did not exist at the time when he was mustered. Obviously that is just. It appears to me, however, that the proviso contains general legislation.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the word "hereafter," in line 18 of section 1, be stricken out after the word "and;" so as to read: "And each member of each examining board shall," &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JACKSON. I understand from the Senator from Iowa that he keeps in the proviso found from line 30 to line 33, which is certainly new legislation, and that is retained in the bill because the Senate has heretofore expressed its judgment that it is proper legislation.

Mr. ALLISON. To what line does the Senator refer?

Mr. JACKSON. The proviso from line 30 to line 33. I understood the Senator to state that that new legislation was retained by the committee because it had received the sanction of the Senate heretofore in separate bills that had covered that provision.

Mr. ALLISON. No; the Senator misunderstood me. The Senator from Kansas interrogated me upon this point, and I stated to him that the Committee on Appropriations understood this to be a mere assertion of the law as it now exists, and therefore we did not choose to recommend that it be stricken out. Of course any Senator can make a motion to strike it out.

Mr. JACKSON. It is clearly new legislation. Instead of moving to strike it out, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to add as an amendment the bill the Senate passed last Friday on the subject of pension fees.

Mr. ALLISON. That relates to that part of the bill found on page 4 and the succeeding pages.

Mr. JACKSON. Yes, sir. It seems to me that when the Senate referred that bill to a committee of this body, when it received its investigation and sanction, and then was unanimously adopted by the Senate, consent ought to be given to allow it as an amendment to this bill rather than that the legislation should fail. I ask the consent of the Senate that the bill passed by the Senate may be taken as an amendment to the pension appropriation bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the amendment be read.

Mr. JACKSON. The amendment I propose is the bill that was passed by the Senate on Friday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the bill be amended by adding thereto what will now be read by the Chief Clerk.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the matter contained in Senate bill No. 2511.

Mr. ALLISON. The Chief Clerk is not reading the bill as it was passed by the Senate on Friday. At the close of the second section we inserted the words "under such regulations as the Commissioner of Pensions may prescribe."

Mr. JACKSON. I sent to the desk the reprint of the bill, and I supposed it contained the exact amendments that were adopted by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper the Senator from Tennessee has sent to the desk the Chair understands is not a correct reprint of the bill.

Mr. JACKSON. My idea was to propose the reprint with the amendments as adopted. The Secretary can procure a correct copy of the reprint.

Mr. MITCHELL. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the bill as it was passed by the Senate was incorrectly printed at first. After the incorrect print was received it was returned to the Printing Office, and a correct reprint is now here. I have a copy of the correct reprint, which was furnished me this morning.

Mr. JACKSON. That is the amendment I desire to offer. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania send that to the desk?

Mr. MITCHELL. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that there be added to the bill as amended what will be read for information.

Mr. DAWES. Before it is read I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee if it is his proposal to ask the Senate unanimously to reverse the decision of yesterday?

Mr. JACKSON. I suppose that would be the effect of the request. Inasmuch as some new legislation is retained in the bill that the Senate has heretofore approved, I ask that the Senate retain this, which the Senate has also approved by a unanimous vote, I believe.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the majority of the Senate will take notice of the fact that it is proposed to-day by a unanimous vote of the Senate to undo what it did yesterday and reverse the construction put upon the rule yesterday, so that to-morrow we shall know exactly the opinion of the Senate upon the subject of inserting legislation in appropriation bills. Yesterday we decided that come what may there should be no legislation in an appropriation bill; and we are asked now unanimously to say that that means only such legislation as we do not like!

Mr. JACKSON. There is just this difference in the two cases which occurs to me, that the amendment recommended by the Committee on Appropriations, which was stricken out yesterday on the point of order as being legislation on an appropriation bill, had never received the sanction of the Senate and had never been considered by the Senate. My proposed amendment has received the sanction of the Senate; it has been investigated by a committee of this body; it has been reported to the body and adopted by the body.

Mr. DAWES. I suppose that means that it is only a question of time at what time we shall introduce independent legislation on an appropriation bill—that is, before it has been considered or after it has been considered by the Senate as a separate measure.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I do not think the Senator from Massachusetts states the case correctly. The Senate did not resolve yesterday that, come what may, no general legislation should be placed upon general appropriation bills. It simply decided that under the rule, if objection be made, general legislation could not be placed upon general appropriation bills. That is all the Senate decided.

Mr. DAWES. I understood the Senator from Wisconsin, whom I am following implicitly, to say that he understood it in the way I stated.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Senator misunderstood me.

Mr. DAWES. I suppose I did.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Senator from Wisconsin voted to give a construction to the rule as he understood it. He did not vote at all upon the question as to whether general legislation shall not be placed upon general appropriation bills, but simply that under the rule as it now is if objection be made general legislation can not be placed upon general appropriation bills; that is all.

Mr. PLATT. I am opposed to general legislation on appropriation bills, and I am opposed to placing it there by unanimous consent. I do not like to be placed in a position where, to carry out my ideas of proper legislation, I must object to a proposition of this kind; but as my position is founded on principle, and as I believe it is better to adhere to the principle than to violate it whenever there is some legislation proposed which we desire to have enacted, I shall object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MORGAN in the chair). The Senator from Connecticut objects to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, while I am opposed as much as any man in the body—and have so held for the ten years I have been in the Senate—to legislating on appropriation bills, that is not now the question before us. Legislation comes from the House to the Senate on an appropriation bill. It may be wise legislation or it may not be. It may be wise but defective. The question then comes up, can the Senate amend that legislation which has reached us from the House under their rules? It is conceded by all that—

Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members.

And:

Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings.

That is entirely clear. There is another clause in the Constitution which bears on the proposition:

All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments as on other bills.

It occurs to me that although each House may adopt rules for its own government, yet those rules must be consistent with the provisions of the Constitution. They can not be in conflict, but they must be in conformity with its provisions. In the only case in which the House has the exclusive right of originating a bill, a revenue bill, that clause itself reserves to the Senate the right to propose or concur with amendments as on other bills, thereby showing conclusively that it is the constitutional right of the Senate to propose amendments or to concur in amendments.

That being the case, a rule, under the power given to each House to make its own rules, must conform to the Constitution and not violate it. How can a rule of this body deprive a member of the Senate or the Senate of the right of amending any bill whatever that comes here from the House?

So, not pretending to be a rule man, I do not believe that any rule can be adopted which will deprive a member of the Senate or the Senate of the right of making an amendment germane to any proposition which comes to us from the House.

As to the manner in which a bill should come to us from the House, the House determine that; we have nothing to do with it. It is their business, not ours. The Constitution does not provide any specific method in which a bill shall be drawn. It is perfectly true that most States have determined it to be wise that no bill shall relate to more than one subject, and that the subject shall be set forth in the caption, but that is not required by the Constitution. A bill comes to us. It matters not how it comes. It contains legislation, and the Senate believes that that legislation ought to be amended. The Senate has the right under the Constitution to amend, unless that right is destroyed by reason of a rule which is adopted by this body. Can a rule be made in such a manner as to deprive any member of the Senate of a constitutional right? I think not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee. [Mr. JACKSON] asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to offer an amendment. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] objects, and the amendment is not before the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to strike out the proviso after the word "made" in lines 29, 30, 31, 32, and 33 of section 1, on the ground that it is general legislation.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senate will not do any such thing. That would be carrying our new idea to an extreme extent. There is not a man in the Senate who does not know that this provision sent to us by the House is right and just, and that it is a gross outrage and a shame that a man should now at the end of twenty years be compelled to prove a fact which the Government by its own officers, by its medical examiners, admitted at the time when the soldier commenced his service. He may have passed through the service, he may have been wounded, and now he may be absolutely unable to prove that when he entered the service he was a well man. Although the Government certified it, its medical officer found it, and his services were received and he performed those services, yet it may be a physical impossibility to prove the fact. Some cases have been brought to my attention where it is absolutely impossible for a man to prove the condition of his health, the condition of his body twenty-odd years ago.

Mr. JACKSON. Will the Senator from Ohio yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. JACKSON. That is the rule in reference to privates, but I believe the officers are subjected to no examination, yet this proviso in the bill would relate to the cases of officers who are subjected to no such examination prior to enlistment.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is a just provision. Why should we strike it out merely because all at once we find out that it is wrong to put legislative provisions upon an appropriation bill? We have done so repeatedly. I venture to say that there has hardly been a single general appropriation bill passed in the last twenty years—sometimes the fortification bill or some other little bill may have passed without it—that has not had legislative provisions in it, and we have put them on ourselves time and time again. I would not carry on this farce any further. I shall not vote to strike out the proviso, and I shall insist upon the yeas and nays.

Mr. INGALLS. So shall I.

Mr. SHERMAN. If we are going to do it, then let us strip these appropriation bills and say to the House that they shall not correct an error when they have made a mistake, that they shall not do anything, by unanimous consent. Now, because it has been misplaced or has not been dotted right, or that the t's are not crossed, or because of some other critical objection which is made, it is proposed to deny to the soldier a rule that is manifestly equitable, just, and right, and which we all know to be right. I for one shall not vote for any such proposition.

Mr. VOORHEES. What is the motion of the Senator from Kansas? I did not hear it distinctly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chief Clerk will report it. It has not been reported by the Chief Clerk.

Mr. VOORHEES. Is it to strike out the proviso entirely?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chief Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 29, after the word "made," it is proposed to strike out down to and including the word "rebutted" in line 33, as follows:

Provided, That all applicants for pensions shall be presumed to have had no disability at the time of enlistment; but such presumption may be rebutted.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from Kansas moves to strike out the proviso which has been read. In that I can not agree with him. The suggestions made by the Senator from Ohio have been in my mind for years past, and they have been greatly strengthened within the last few months.

When a soldier went to enlist in the service of his country he underwent the severest physical examination a man ever undergoes who is a well man. There is no such examination ever given to the human system, unless it is down prone with sickness, as the medical surgeons gave to the men when they were enlisted. With a certificate that the man was fit to fight, that he was well enough to shoulder a musket, sound enough to sleep on the ground, and live on hard food, he went to the front. I think a meaner, more contemptible spectacle no government ever presented than that which is presented by the Government of the United States saying that that is not an estoppel; that it can go behind that and prove that the certificate of the agent of the Government was false, and that the soldier was not a sound man. After obtaining his service on the field, his exposure to death, his wounds, his blood and all, it can then turn around and say when he applies for a pension, "Despite the certificate which we gave you in order to get your services, you are not a sound man."

Certain instances have come to my mind of the most shocking character. During the last canvass of the State of Indiana, in which I was engaged, I remember well—I remember the town and the place and the grove where it occurred—a little Irishman came up to me to show me his pension papers. In looking at them I saw that the last communication betweep him and his Government was a paper stating that his pension claim had been rejected because he was not sound at the time of enlistment. I asked him how long he had served. His papers showed he had been in the service three years and a half; he had been mustered out on the great campaign closing in Virginia. While talking with him I observed on his coat lapel something that I took to be a silver dollar. He was so poorly dressed that I wondered he should have anything like an ornament upon him. I investigated and found that under a law which scarcely a Senator on this floor now knows exists, he had been decorated by his Government with a silver medal given to a private by order of the War Office, and which read as follows substantially: "Presented to Michael Torpey for distinguished and conspicuous gallantry at Edgefield Junction, Tennessee, August 22, 1863." There stood that man crippled and warped with inflammatory rheumatism, which he had contracted by lying upon the ground in the service, decorated with a medal, of which a soldier of Napoleon might have been proud, on one lapel of his coat and in his pocket a letter from the Commissioner of Pensions telling him that in despite of fifty battles and in despite of his decoration of honor, nobler to him than the cross of the Legion of Honor ever was to a soldier of Europe, his pension application was rejected because he was not sound when he was mustered into the service.

I state this case among hundreds and thousands, but I state it because it is a very strong one. The Government had had that man's service. He came out broken; he came out decorated; and he was rejected from the pension-rolls of his country. I do not know whether he has since succeeded in getting a pension. That man had been thoroughly examined, the surgeons had passed upon him, and he was so sound and his conduct so good that he received distinctions unusual in our service. I could detail, if I saw fit, the circumstances which called for this unusual attention and honor on the part of his country. He had been told to retreat from an exposed position. Although a private he was virtually in command of a squad of men, for courage takes command over rank in desperate situations. His commanding officer from a place of safety called upon him to come back from there or he would be killed. In the midst of shot falling thick and fast he exclaimed over his shoulder, "What are we here for except to be killed or hold this place?" and they held it.

Yet this Government rejects pensions on the ground that men like him, whose services were given, were not sound. I interrogated him a little more and I found the usual explanation, that somebody had testified that some time in the years gone by he had had some rheumatism perhaps, had been seen a little crippled up. Suppose he had, what care I whether he was sound or not; when a man gives such services as that, I shall not pause for a moment, had I the power, to question a man's right to a pension. Even if he had limped before he went into the service he earned a pension.

I hope this clause will stand in the bill as it is. It should have been in the law long before now. It is tardy justice, but it has come at last, and it will stay.

Mr. FRYE. I call the attention of the Senator from Indiana to the fact that more than a year ago the Senate sent to the House a bill which provided that service in the Army should be prima facie evidence of soundness, and to the additional fact that that bill has not yet become a law.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from Maine I suppose is alluding to the amendments of what is called the Mexican pension bill.

Mr. FRYE. I am.

Mr. VOORHEES. That is a mixed-up affair, I thought unfortunately presented, though the measure the Senator speaks of was entirely right, and I voted for it here.

Mr. FRYE. Now I desire to say one word further, called out by the remark of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]. The blame, if there is any blame, for the position in which the Senate is placed to-day is that of the Senate alone, a majority of it. A proposition comes before the United States Senate which under the ruling of the presiding officer can not be stricken out on objection or on a point of order; it can only be stricken out by a vote on a motion to strike out. The motion to strike out is made, as the motion now is made in this case, and the presiding officer of the Senate rules that that motion being made the subject-matter of it is not open to amendment; that it must be stricken out. The Senate yesterday by a vote on the yeas and nays sustained the presiding officer in that ruling, and he having been sustained in it by the Senate there is but one thing for the Senate to do, and that is to strike out.

I respectfully contend that the majority of the Senate was wrong; that when it was admitted that you can not act upon general legislation on an appropriation bill in the Senate except by a motion to strike out, the moment the motion to strike out is made that general legislation is before the Senate for consideration, and there is no rule, there is no parliamentary law, when a matter is before a body like this for consideration, which prevents amendment. On the contrary, it is open to amendment just so long as any Senator in this body desires to amend, there being no previous question here.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to ask my friend from Maine if he does not know that there is an express rule which requires that a motion to amend a clause proposed to be stricken out shall first be put before the motion to strike out can be put? The motion to strike out this clause can not be put to the Senate until every Senator here has had an opportunity, according to the express rule, to move to amend the part proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. FRYE. I thank the Senator from Ohio for the suggestion. I was going to add further that the whole spirit of Rule XVIII is that when a motion is made to strike out, the part moved to be stricken out shall be open to amendment, and it is the right of every Senator before he is compelled to vote on the question of whether or not a proposition shall be stricken out, to modify it, to improve it, to make it satisfactory to himself or to the Senate before he is compelled to vote on the yeas and nays whether or not it shall be stricken out. I say there is only one exception known to parliamentary law, and that is where in a body by its rules there is a previous question, and that previous question is ordered by the required vote of that body. Then amendment and discussion are cut off; but no Senator can name another instance in parliamentary law or in the rules of any legislative body in the United States of America, where a proposition is legitimately before the body and a motion is made to strike out a portion of that legislation, that that proposition is not open to amendment.

So I contend respectfully that my vote was right yesterday and that the ruling of the presiding officer was wrong yesterday, and that the Senate did not avail itself of the opportunity it had then to overrule that ruling of the presiding officer.

Why, Mr. President, the Senate by that iron rule is only going to put itself into the position in which the resolution offered by the Senator from Kansas three or four days ago would place it. It is only going to compel the Senate in time to adopt the rule that any proposition, any amendment, germane and relevant shall be in order, for so long as the present rule abides in the other House, and general legislation comes here, ay, even without the rule, it is in the power of the majority of the House to put general legislation on the appropriation bills, and so long as that condition of things exists there is no power in the Senate to amend. The Senate itself would in cases like the one now under question be compelled to open its own rules, which I should regard as a very serious misfortune. I believe that the iron rule will compel us to do what in my judgment we ought not to do, provide by our own rules to put general legislation on appropriation bills.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Will the Senator allow me a remark right here?

Mr. FRYE. With pleasure.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Rule XVI provides that—

No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill, &c.

A few days ago the Senator from Kansas proposed a resolution looking to an amendment of that rule. That resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules, of which my friend from Maine is the chairman. I do not know whether the Committee on Rules has taken any action upon it or not. All that I know is that it has not yet been reported to the Senate from that committee.

The Senator now says that he should regard the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas as a very unfortunate thing; but he proposes by construction to open the rule quite as wide as the Senator from Kansas proposes to open it by his resolution, so that it would make very little difference in the result whether the rule were opened wide by the construction which the Senator from Maine desires to be given to it or by the resolution of amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator from Wisconsin state before taking his seat, as I have been absent from the Senate for some days, in what manner and to what extent the resolution of the Senator from Kansas proposes to amend the rule?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. If the Senator from New Jersey will consult the RECORD he will find exactly.

Mr. INGALLS. It proposes to permit any general legislation germane and relevant to general appropriation bills to be offered in the Senate as it now is in the House.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I think the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] also proposed an amendment, or made a suggestion looking to an amendment, to the resolution offered by the Senator from Kansas, and that that proposition was also referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. FRYE. I want to add one word right here in relation to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas. It goes a great deal further, because, as a matter of fact, the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas provides that any amendment germane and relevant shall be in order. Now our rules provide that on the question of relevancy the Senate itself shall determine, not the presiding officer. Therefore the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas provides that any amendment in the opinion of the Senate of the United States relevant shall be in order; so that a majority of the Senate under it may put on any appropriation bill any amendment it pleases.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Senator will allow me to say that the whole matter was confided to the Committee on Rules. That committee was not bound to take the proposition made by the Senator from Kansas as he made it. It was at liberty to alter or amend or change it, or to propose any other amendment to the rules that that committee thought it advisable to propose.

Mr. FRYE. It was referred to the Committee on Rules. It is true that the Committee on Rules immediately held a meeting and considered the amendment. It is true that a majority of the committee were opposed to any amendment of Rule XVI of the Senate and that the chairman was instructed to draw a report, and that the chairman has drawn a report and holds it in his hand, but is not at liberty to present it to the Senate now, from the fact that although authorized to draw the report further action was postponed until the report was submitted to the committee, and it has not yet been so submitted. But the report takes ground against any amendment to Rule XVI and against general legislation on appropriation bills anywhere. Can not the Senator from Wisconsin see the difference between the ruling of the presiding officer of the Senate reversed and the proposition of the Senator from Kansas? They are as broad apart as the two poles. In the one case, there is simply permitted under a ruling of the presiding officer an amendment to legislation already on an appropriation bill, as is the fact here. In the other case amendments would be permitted to be put on in the Senate.

The Senate will pardon me for saying that in my judgment a rule of that kind in the Senate is infinitely more dangerous than it is in the House of Representatives. Why, Mr. President, the early history of legislation shows that the fight was between the Senate and the House, the Senate putting general legislation on appropriation bills and the House resisting. That was true until 1855. The great fight of 1849 was on legislation put on by the Senate and not by the House. And in the Senate when we are confronted with this position, that we pass three hundred Senate bills and send them to the House of Representatives, and they lie on the Speaker's table six months without any reference whatsoever to any committee of the House of Representatives, and when we have the power to legislate on appropriation bills, is not the temptation infinitely stronger in the Senate to avail itself of that opportunity than in the House of Representatives?

Every morning we dispose of every bill and every resolution that comes here from the House. The House could do the same; and under the proposed joint rule sent to the House there was a proposition that they should do so. They do not, but the Senate bills go to the Speaker's table and lie there. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] talked about the bankruptcy bill, the electoral-count bill, and divers other important bills that have been sent there, in a speech that he made here yesterday. If you could under the amendment of the Senator from Kansas load down the appropriation bills with general legislation, would not the temptation be too great to withstand for the Senate, situated as it is with its legislation, to pile and heap on the appropriation bills all conceivable legislation? I say, sir, one proposition is infinitely more dangerous and more liable to be productive of harm than the other.

But I maintain that the ruling of the presiding officer was wrong. I believe under the well-settled principles of parliamentary law it was wrong. If it was wrong—and I believe it—then it is my right and my duty to argue against it and vote against it. I repeat, sir, in no deliberative legislative body on earth can a proposition be placed before it, and no Senator can name one, on which a motion to strike out can be made without opening that proposition to motions to amend, except where a previous question has been ordered.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I think I can name another.

Mr. FRYE. I shall be happy to hear it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I can name it, I think, here and now. Take the case that was under consideration yesterday, the proviso on page 2:

Provided, That all applicants for pensions shall be presumed to have had no disability at the time of enlistment; but such presumption may be rebutted.

That is the provision as it came from the House to the Senate and as it stood before it was acted upon by the Senate Committee on Appropriations. The Senate Committee on Appropriations proposed this amendment—to insert, after "pensions," the words "who shall have served at least three months after date of muster." If it be admitted that that is general legislation, then, notwithstanding the general parliamentary rule which the Senator from Maine correctly states, clause 3 of Rule XVI steps in and provides that no amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill. That is the special rule which governs. It prevails over the general parliamentary rule to which the Senator from Maine refers.

So that in addition to the case he has stated, where a previous question prevails, I say that where a special rule governs it is another case where an amendment can not be received when the motion is to strike out. A proposition to amend the portion to be stricken out can not be received if that is an insertion of general legislation into a general appropriation bill.

Mr. FRYE. I contend, Mr. President, that clause 3 of Rule XVI is not open to that interpretation. I contend that clause 3 of Rule XVI applies to propositions made by the Senate for general legislation on an appropriation bill, and that under well-settled parliamentary law when another body sends general legislation on appropriation bills to this body, and a motion is made to strike out that general legislation, not proposed by the Senate at all, but proposed by another body and legitimately before the Senate, it is open to amendment, and that the power to amend can not be cut off except by a rule which affirmatively and positively provides that no proposition for general legislation sent to the Senate by the House shall be open to amendment; else the thing is utterly absurd.

Here is general legislation in this bill of great importance. It comes before the Senate of the United States, and the Senator from Kansas makes a motion to strike it out, and I am compelled to vote "yea" or "nay" on that. I think it is absurd to say that I am compelled to vote "yea" or "nay" unless first I have exercised the right which all parliamentary law gives me to perfect that legislation which it is proposed to strike out.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Then change paragraph 3 of Rule XVI. There is no use talking about imposing an iron rule upon ourselves. If there be an iron rule it is imposed by the rules we have prescribed to ourselves.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

SUITS FOR DAMAGES.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to present the report of a conference committee at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee, from a conference committee on the part of the Senate, submits a report on the bill (H. R. 7131) to authorize suits for damages where death results from the wrongful act or neglect of any person or corporation in the District of Columbia. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report.

Mr. HARRIS. I see that the word "section" is left out after the word "second" in one clause of the report. I will for the present withdraw it in order that the word may be inserted. I shall have to see the conferees on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the report is withdrawn.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7785) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS].

Mr. MILLER, of California. Rule XVIII seems to imply that where a motion is made to amend by striking out a portion of a bill a motion to amend the part proposed to be stricken out shall have precedence and be put before the question is taken on the motion to strike out. I desire to offer an amendment to the part of the bill which the Senator from Kansas has moved to strike out, by inserting after the word "pensions," in line 30, the words "who shall have served three months next after date of muster into service."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I merely wanted the ruling of the Chair. Now, Mr. President, a motion to strike out a portion of the matter included in the motion of the Senator from Kansas would be in order, and I therefore move that all after the word "enlistment," in line 32 of that clause, be stricken out, being the words, "but such presumption may be rebutted."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California moves to amend by striking out the words "but such presumption may be rebutted." The question is on this motion.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I inquire what became of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is pending; but under another rule of the Senate it is in order to perfect within the rules the paragraph proposed to be stricken out. The Senator from California moves to perfect the paragraph by striking out a certain part of it, so as to bring the Senate to a vote on what will be left if the Senate should agree to the motion.

Mr. INGALLS. Is that motion an amendment to the section?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is an amendment to the paragraph proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to state that it would be unwise, if the provision in the bill is to become a law, to agree to the amendment proposed by the Senator from California. I could give the Senate an instance of almost an entire regiment which was mustered into service near here, in the State of Maryland, during the late war, composed of persons who had been examined and rejected by the examiners appointed by the Government. Of course those musters were fraudulent. I could also give very many instances of individuals who were substitutes for other persons, where the examination was made of some other person, and it is necessary for the protection of the Government that there should be the right to rebut this presumption.

Mr. MILLER, of California. When the Government has accepted a soldier and received his service, it has no right to come in afterward and say that he was not sound at the time of his enlistment, and it has no right to rebut the presumption that he was a sound man, because the Government itself decided that he was a sound man at the time of his enlistment.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me a word right there?

Mr. MILLER, of California. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. In the case I stated it is a matter of history that nearly the whole of a regiment had been examined and rejected, and afterward, by a fraud upon the Government, they were mustered into service. Does the Senator say that in a case of that kind the Government should not be permitted to protect itself against a muster of that sort?

Mr. MILLER, of California. The amendment which I offered, and which was ruled out on a point of order, would have protected the Government in that case by requiring that the men should have served three months; but it seems we can not get that in. While there may be such a case as the Senator mentions, there are thousands and tens of thousands of cases where pensions have been refused to soldiers who served well and faithfully because they were technically not sound at the time of their muster into service; they were under some disability. I claim that in these instances great injustice has been done, and great injustice continues to be done in such cases. It is better that the Government should suffer a loss in the case the Senator from Pennsylvania mentions than that all this great number of men should be so unjustly treated. I do not know of any such cases as he mentions. I suppose there is some foundation for the statement, and perhaps frauds have been perpetrated upon the Government in the matter of enlistments, but they were not usual; they were extreme cases.

I do not propose to prolong the discussion upon this matter. Of course I would rather have the clause with the words which the Committee on Appropriations proposed to put in, and which I in substance moved to insert just now, included in the law before striking out the words that I have moved to strike out; but I do not believe the Government ought to go into a trial of the soldier who is asking for a pension upon the question of fact whether he was under a physical disability at the time of his enlistment. I do not think it is just or right to do it. It puts the soldier to great inconvenience and great trouble.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry, and that is whether this motion to amend the part proposed to be stricken out on the motion of the Senator from Kansas, by striking out "but such presumption may be rebutted," is in order under the ruling of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. BLAIR. I understood the decision of the Senate yesterday to be that this section, properly here from the House, part of a general appropriation bill coming from the House, can not be amended by action of the Senate. It went certainly to this extent, that it can not be amended by the action of the Senate when that action involved the addition of further words. But it is obvious that a general appropriation bill or any proposition can be quite as essentially amended by striking out as by adding words. The Senate ruled that the sense of this proposition, coming here rightfully from the House of Representatives, could not be changed by additional words emanating from the Senate itself. Now do I understand that the Senate may entirely change the sense of that same proposition by striking out words, when it can not affect the sense of the proposition by making additions thereto?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair holds that amendments proposing to strike out legislation or a part of legislation in an appropriation bill are in order. It would be in order to move to strike out all the legislative provisions of the bill in a body, all together, or to strike them out word by word, as stripping the bill, as far as the motion goes, of its legislative provisions.

Mr. BLAIR. Perhaps not entirely in the nature of a parliamentary inquiry, if I have the floor, I should like to state a few points in this matter that trouble me, and I should be glad to see them elucidated. I wish that the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] were present who gave us such a zealous and emphatic dissertation upon parliamentary law; but he is not here. My difficulties can be perhaps as well resolved otherwise. I understand that everybody agrees that a general appropriation bill must come from the House.

Mr. INGALLS and others. No.

Mr. BLAIR. Well, Mr. President, it is agreed that a general appropriation bill coming from the House, whether it is simply a bill of supply or a bill of supply plus general legislation, is rightfully here, and as it comes from the House it must be properly considered by the Senate, or it may be—I will use as a matter of preference the words "must be"—as a matter of legislative duty considered by the Senate. There are no rules of the Senate to the contrary, at all events. When that general appropriation bill in its entirety is thus properly in the possession of the Senate for action, we are met by a rule of the Senate which says that we shall not act upon that portion of the bill coming from the House which proposes general legislation. We may alter and amend, approve or reject, as we please, that part which does not propose general legislation but which is strictly a supply bill; but the part which proposes general legislation we must either accept precisely as it comes from the House or we must reject it in toto. There is no rule which compels us to reject it.

I think this is of the very gist of this whole discussion. There is no rule which compels us to reject it. There is a rule which deprives us of the power to modify it. The Senate yesterday construed that rule, and its decision was that the rule is simply that we can not modify what comes to us; we must accept it as it comes to us or we must reject it in toto; yet the rule does not require us to reject it in toto. We may, however, under the rule permit the motion, which the Senator from Kansas has last made, to strike out to be made. If it strikes out the whole, excludes the whole, of this proposed legislation, then any member of the Senate holding to the rule and to the construction of the rule which was adopted yesterday may support that motion, as I understand. But believing in and voting for the construction of the rule which was adopted yesterday, that we may not amend that proposed general legislation, I do not see wherein, believing in that construction and voting for that construction of the rule and for striking off the proposed amendments (whether by additional words or by striking out so as to change the nature of the proposition, which is now the suggestion of the Senator from California), I am involved in any inconsistency if I vote for the motion of the Senator from Kansas, that motion being to strike out the entire proposition which came from the House. I think I am consistent, and I think the majority of the Senate would be perfectly consistent in approving of his motion. He holds to the contrary. The speech of the Senator from Maine was made specifically to charge upon the majority of the Senate inconsistency if they fail to vote against this motion to strike out. It seems to me that we are consistent with ourselves and we still enforce the rule. Here comes this proposition from the House in its entirety. There is nothing in the rule of the Senate which prevents us from rejecting the whole. The rule of the Senate simply prevents us from modifying the whole; and, notwithstanding the suggestion of the Chair, I beg leave to ask whether I am not right in saying that under that rule of the Senate we can neither modify by addition nor by striking out. We must reject the proposition as a whole in order to be outside the rule.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. If the Senator from New Hampshire will look at the third clause of Rule XVI, I think he will see that he states it broader than the rule lays it down.

Mr. BLAIR. "Nor shall any amendment to any item or clause"——

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. "No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill." Any amendment can be received under this rule which does not propose general legislation.

Mr. BLAIR. I understand that; I am only dealing with that portion of a general appropriation bill which, coming properly from the House, proposes general legislation.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. But the Senator from New Hampshire stated as broadly as it could be stated that the Senate must either take the proposition that comes from the House as a whole or reject it as a whole.

Mr. BLAIR. The proposition containing general legislation.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. We can modify that proposition if our modification or amendment does not propose general legislation.

Mr. BLAIR. We can make an amendment which strikes out the whole. That is not a proposition for general legislation.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Certainly not.

Mr. BLAIR. But what I say is this: When a proposition comes here for general legislation and we propose to amend that by striking out any portion of it, thereby changing the sense of that proposition, then we offer an amendment and force an amendment in violation of this rule touching general legislation.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. But is it in violation of the rule? The rule simply is "no amendment which proposes general legislation."

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. This proposition to strike out does not propose any legislation.

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly it does, because will the general legislation if adopted with these words stricken out be the same general legislation that it would if the words were not stricken out? Does the Senator suggest that the sense of a proposition can not be changed by striking out as well as by inserting? The point I think is a very clear one and a very important one, and I feel that the Senate, to be at all consistent with itself if holding to its vote of yesterday, must disagree to the suggestion of the presiding officer at the present time, that this proposition coming from the House may be corrected by striking out when it can not be amended by inserting.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that under the rule of the Senate which the Chair is bound to enforce as he understands it, subject to the judgment of the Senate afterward——

Mr. BLAIR. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has not yet stated his conclusion. The Senator will pardon the Chair. The Chair is proceeding to make a decision from which the Senator from New Hampshire desires to take an appeal. The amendment proposed by the Senator from California to strike out certain words is in order, the reason of the Chair in so holding being that in the opinion of the Chair the motion of the Senator from California does not propose general legislation, but proposes to strike out general legislation which is contained in the bill. It is true that the motion does not propose to strike out all the legislation in the bill; and what the consequence may be as to what is left if that is not stricken out, is a matter with which the Chair has nothing to do. Does the Senator from New Hampshire appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. BLAIR. If there is any desire for further discussion I withdraw the appeal for the moment. Can I renew it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The appeal is open to discussion.

Mr. BLAIR. Then I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire appeals from the decision of the Chair on this point. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. HARRISON. It seems to me that the rule as stated by the Chair, while it appears to have plausibility, is after all perhaps sticking in the bark a little. It can very well be seen that the striking out of a thing may convert a proposition which is affirmative into a negative proposition or a negative into an affirmative proposition; as for instance, in this case, if the House legislation should say that it should not be presumed that the soldier was suffering under disability at the time of enlistment, if under the rules of the Senate we might amend by striking out the word "not" we should have as effectually introduced new legislation by that amendment as if it had been contained in an independent and separate proposition.

So it seems to me that unless the motion here to strike out strikes out some substantive part of the House legislation so as to deprive it of any force, the particular proposition is given the power to carry the whole with it instead of being a mere modification and being intended to be a modification of it. So then in the one case the ruling of the Chair might be correct and in the other incorrect, because the proposition of the Senator from California does not destroy, does not strike out any affirmative piece of legislation, but converts it from one thing into another, and is as distinctively a change in legislation by an amendment in the Senate involving general legislation as if it had been accomplished by the insertion of new words.

Thus it seems to me in the one case the ruling of the Chair might be right where something was to be stricken out, some proposition, but if it is the striking out of a word that converts the legislation from an affirmative to a negative proposition and changes the whole scope of it, but maintains the legislation, it is subject to the rule against amendments of general legislation.

Mr. MILLER, of California. My purpose in moving these amendments was to see how it was that we could not insert matter in provisions that came to the Senate, and at the same time we might strike out words which would also change the sense and make essentially new legislation. The words which I moved to insert were clearly general legislation, and the words which I have now moved to strike out convert this proposition from a prima facie presumption to a conclusive presumption that the soldier was under no disability when he was mustered in.

It seems to me that the proposition to strike out here involves a question of general legislation just as much as the proposition to insert. The words of the House provision are:

That all applicants for pensions shall be presumed to have had no disability at the time of enlistment; but such presumption may be rebutted.

If we strike out the words "but such presumption may be rebutted," then what was a prima facie case for the soldier, a prima facie presumption in his favor, becomes a conclusive presumption. It changes the entire sense of the provision and makes it a new legislative proposition, a new law differing totally from that which this would be if enacted as submitted to us. I have made these propositions for the express purpose of having the ruling of the Chair upon them, to test the question whether we could do the one thing or whether we could not effect the same object by the insertion of words, as by the striking out of words in a proposition from the House containing legislation.

Mr. INGALLS. Upon the decision of this question would depend whether the Senate can do by indirection what it can not directly do. If the Chair will observe the language that I propose to strike out by my motion, in connection with the portion that the Senator from California proposes to eliminate, the Chair will see that the effect of striking out the words which the Senator from California moves to eliminate from the bill will be exactly the same as if the word "conclusively" were to be inserted before the word "presumed" in line 31.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair may be allowed to state that the Chair thinks the fundamental question is, first, whether it is competent under the rules of the Senate, legislation coming on a House bill, for the Senate to strike it out. The Chair supposes that everybody agrees that it is. Then the question is whether you are bound to strike out the whole of it altogether, or may strike out a part of it and leave some of it still standing. Take an appropriation bill in which, as in this instance, there are several sections. If a motion be made to strike out one section of the legislation and not made to strike out all the sections of legislation, it changes the character of the bill. It will be if it becomes a law a different law from what it would have been had the section been left to stand. The Chair thinks that the same intellectual reason would apply to the striking out of a part of a section, just as the Senator from Kansas has moved himself to strike out a proviso to a section that may be supposed to contain and as the Chair thinks does contain legislation. The Chair has entertained that motion because, so far as it goes, if agreed to by the Senate, it rids the bill of so much legislation. It leaves the bill a different bill and with different legislative provisions and that may have a different effect than it would have if the section, or the proviso, or the part of the proviso had been left in. So the Chair thought and still thinks the motion of the Senator from California is in order although the consequence may be that the bill will be entirely different with those words stricken out, and that the proviso will be different as the bill would be different if the proviso itself were stricken out.

The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. HOAR. I was absent from my seat for a moment on public business, and I ask that the Chair will restate the proposition; I do not mean restate the entire proposition in full, but state the substance of the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moved that the proviso on page 2, lines 29 to 33, be stricken out. Pending that motion the Senator from California moved to perfect that proviso under another rule of the Senate, by moving to strike out the words "but such presumption may be rebutted." The question of order having been made whether the motion of the Senator from California was in order to strike out those words, before the question was put on the motion of the Senator from Kansas, the Chair held that that was in order. From that decision the Senator from New Hampshire appealed to the Senate. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate? [Putting the question.] The ayes have it.

Mr. BLAIR. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from California.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS].

Mr. CONGER rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan desire to address the Senate?

Mr. CONGER. I did desire to do so on the amendment of the Senator from California.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair had announced the result of the vote, but the Chair will consider it as not having been announced, as the Senator from Michigan had risen to address the Senate upon the question.

Mr. CONGER. I should like to have a vote upon that proposition. I think with a clause standing in the bill that the presumption may be rebutted by other evidence, it leaves the applicant for a pension in a worse condition than now, the clause providing that the enlistment shall be considered as presumptive evidence of soundness but may be rebutted by other evidence. Where, how, and in what manner, and what kind of a suggestion? We are met with that continually now, on the mere suggestion of the Pension Office or of some clerk in the office, that some letter has been received or some statement or some suggestion of incompetency or disease or disability existing before the muster-in; and now a claimant is required to search through all the country to find out somebody to rebut the mere suggestions of the office, or of private letters, or of anonymous letters, as I have known in some cases.

With a statement that the presumption of soundness at the time of the muster-in may be rebutted by other testimony, without defining how it shall be obtained or what amount of testimony may rebut that presumption, I venture to say that every person who is called upon to sustain the question of soundness before enlistment will be more and more embarrassed by this provision as it stands than he would be under the present construction of the law in the Pension Office. At least 50,000 cases are hanging just upon that one question, upon which every Senator, I presume, receives twenty-five or thirty letters a week from the applicant and from his friends, saying that he is unable to find testimony to prove that he was sound—that he is unable to meet the suggestion of an enemy that he was unsound before his enlistment. The whole trouble will be aggravated and the complaints will come upon Senators and upon members of the House with redoubled force.

Sir, what matter is it if there were a few cases of fraudulent muster-in by proper officers of the United States? What matter is it to us if there was a regiment or a part of a regiment rejected because the men were assumed by one mustering officer to be unsound, and by another mustering officer, perhaps infinitely better prepared to decide justly, to be sound and were mustered in? The Government has had their services. They went into the service and into battle. Some lost their health; others lost their lives. They did all that soldiers could possibly do for their country; they endured all hardships, were exposed to all perils. There is no question of cowardice, no question of desertion; but somebody comes twenty years after and says there was some infirmity, some complaint about this man in his boyhood, in his early years, which escaped the attention of the mustering-in officer and the rigid examination which was held over him in these cases.

Now, I want a yea-and-nay vote upon a proposition to strike out this clause, which, in my judgment, would embarrass the poor soldier more than he is embarrassed now, and what seems to come as a benefit really becomes an unmitigated curse to the poor, disabled soldier who is seeking a pension from his country.

By the strictness of our laws, I will not say by false constructions of them by the officials of the Pension Bureau, we have now through this country thousands of suspended cases in which every man in the community believes the applicant is entitled to a pension. They are men who have known the soldier from his youth up, and his daily life, and his health and his strength, and his labor, until he went into the Army, as I know cases of men young, vigorous, able to perform all labor, able to engage in all athletic sports, full of vigor and full of life. They went into the Army, performed their duty well, returned, and asked for a pension; and some enemy, in most cases some enemy, some traitor himself to his country, envying the soldier for the possibility of a pension, writes letters raising doubts of his health, of his soundness before he was enlisted.

I could pick out of my file of letters which have been sent to me some fifty or sixty coming to me in that same way, with the proof that an enemy interposed this objection with no proof but a naked assertion, and threw the applicant upon his proof—unspecified proof, with no date, no time, nothing which a soldier can meet as he is required to do in other cases. There are cases of that kind lingering along now in the Pension Office or compelled to be brought to Congress for relief, where I know the men went forth to battle for their country as strong, hearty, vigorous, and valiant as men ever went, and they came home worn out, diseased, the very life sapped from their system, and they are gradually sinking and sinking from no known cause to their graves.

Sir, I have been more ashamed of the procrastination and I have been more ashamed of the pension laws when these questions have come to me and these charges of unsoundness in that roundabout and hostile way than of anything connected with the soldier which has fallen under my observation. I had almost said that right or wrong I would vote to repeal any rule that prevented any amendment or prevented the introduction into a bill of a clause which should compel one department of this Government to take in good faith the decision of another department of the Government that a man was sound when he enlisted in the service of his country, and when he returned a poor, shattered wreck from disease or from wounds or whatever might be the cause he might be entitled to the benefit of a pension without wearing out years and years of hopeless effort to defeat a hostile and a false charge of previous infirmity.

With that view, I ask for the yeas and nays upon agreeing to the proposition.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONGER. Will the Chair state the question again, so that we may understand it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from California, which is in section 1, line 32, after the word "enlistment," to strike out the words:

But such presumption may be rebutted.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, if the amendment proposed by the committee, which limited this presumption to such soldiers as had rendered three months' service, could have been continued in the bill, I should have been entirely willing to make the presumption a conclusive one, but under the point of order made against the amendment suggested by the committee those words have been stricken out.

If the amendment of the Senator from California is adopted, it makes the presumption of soundness absolutely conclusive upon the Government without reference to service. The soldier may have been mustered in one day and never have left the camp of rendezvous, he may never have faced the enemy in battle, he may never have left the State where he enlisted. In very many cases it may be absolutely certain that the disease for which he asks a pension was upon him at the time of his enlistment, that it not only did not originate in the service but was not aggravated in the service; and yet it is proposed in every such case to make enlistment an absolutely conclusive presumption that he was a sound man.

I am disposed, I think, to be liberal in these matters of pension provisions. I have thought that I was usually safe if I listened to those representations which were made to Congress by the soldiers themselves. If I found myself willing to give them just what they asked in their memorials and petitions and just what they asked through their influential committees of the Grand Army of the Republic, which have appeared before the Committee on Pensions of the Senate, I supposed that I was dealing with liberality toward the soldiers. The proposition which came to us from the committee of the Grand Army of the Republic which met with our Pension Committee at the last session and discussed this matter, was the proposition of the bill, that acceptance and enlistment should be prima facie proof of soundness. I am told by the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, refreshing my own recollection, that such was the request of that committee composed in part of men who were maimed themselves in the heroic defense of their country's flag.

It seems to me that so far from leaving their condition worse it relieves at once those meritorious cases that have been dragging in the Pension Office. Very often a soldier at the time of making his application for a pension is in a community remote from the place of his enlistment; there is no one near him or accessible to him who knew anything about his condition of health prior to his enlistment, and he is greatly embarrassed if the affirmative is put upon him, the burden of proof, to produce to the Department affidavits showing his condition of health at the time of enlistment. But the bill as it comes to us from the House relieves him absolutely from the necessity of producing any evidence on that subject at all. He is not required even to make oath himself that at the time of enlistment he was a sound man. The law says to him: "We take that for granted; we require no proof of you upon the subject;" and at once all of this great class of cases where it has been difficult for the pension applicant to find persons who could make any proof as to his condition of health before enlistment are relieved.

I think that goes far enough; I think it goes as far as the soldiers of this country have asked that it should go. I do not believe they demand that the Government shall be prohibited from showing that fact in the case of those who under the stimulus of great bounty or otherwise were accepted into the service under the exigencies of the Government and immediately broke down, who rendered no service, and where it is apparent that their disease had no connection whatever with their service. The soldiers who ask for a pension, the deserving men to whom the bounty of the Government ought to flow freely as a river, are the men who suffered disability by reason of service. All such by the bill itself are relieved of any burden, even the filing of their own affidavit that they were sound at the time of enlistment.

I should prefer myself, if we could, to have some limitation of service, some months of actual service, in order to make the presumption conclusive. I should be willing to do that; but as we can not have such a provision, I think we go as far as the law goes in any case when we say, "We will give you a prima facie case; we will relieve you from all burden of proof." It is not to be supposed that the Government or anybody else will be very diligent in combating that presumption which we give the soldier at the threshold. The great bulk of these cases will go without challenge, but the provision will exclude those cases (and doubtless in our great Army there were many thousands of such cases) where the disability had no possible connection with the service of the soldier.

Mr. CONGER. The Senator from Indiana, in my opinion, has not met the point in this case. The applicant for a pension under the law with this provision must prove his disability received in the line of duty in the service just as much with the clause as without it.

Mr. HARRISON. Undoubtedly; I did not say the contrary of that; but he is relieved from all obligation to connect his disability with his service by proof that he was sound when he started upon the service.

Mr. CONGER. He is with these words stricken out, but unless that is done he has got to meet all the suggestions of former disability with proof just as much as now if anybody makes the suggestion or brings a little proof of prior disability. It is enough for the soldier that he was received as a sound man and rendered service to his country, whatever was demanded of him, more or less.

The point, and the only point made in this proposition, is that the presumption and the rule for the Pension Office shall be that where the Government certified through its proper officer that the person applying for a pension was sound, and under the strict rules of enlistment was a suitable person to be enlisted and mustered into the service, it shall be taken as conclusive, that the Government shall be held by that rule. I have said in my remarks that striking out the clause proposed by the Senator from California leaves that rule full and positive and beneficial. Leaving that clause in, in my judgment, makes it worse for the soldier than it is now. A mere suggestion of former disability would require him to go through all the proof as he would be required to do without this provision.

But the Senator from Indiana says he would prefer a certain length of service. I can not see how any one who desires to do the applicant good would say that he must show that he had served three months before he could avail himself of the benefits of this proposed legislation.

Mr. MITCHELL. If the Senator from Michigan will allow me at that point, I will state to him what I believe to be the rule at the Pension Office at this time.

Mr. CONGER. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. At the present time the ruling in the Pension Office is, that if the disability appeared within three months of the time of enlistment and muster, then the burden of proof is thrown upon the applicant to show that he was sound at the time of enlistment. It is in pursuance of the practice in the regular Army, where, as I understand, if a soldier is enlisted and is discharged within three months of the time of enlistment, it is expressly stated on the certificate of disability that the disability arose before his entry into the service. It is by analogy with that rule of the regular Army that the Pension Office adopted the rule that where the disability was developed within three months it is presumed that it arose before enlistment.

Mr. CONGER. If that is the rule of the Pension Office, and I suppose it is, it is a rule that never ought to have been adopted, no matter in what other branch of the service it has obtained. The mere circumstances of the case show that that is a harsh and unjust rule. Here are young men going from comfortable homes in the midst of all the enjoyments and comforts of life; they enlist and go into the service, and for the first three months they sleep in wintry nights without tents, they are exposed to all the hardships of camp life before they become hardened. Those three months are the crucial months of a soldier's life. If he can live through them without contracting disease from the exposure he is good for three years. Everybody knows that. So the rule is a wrong one, and the purpose now is to obviate that rule.

Mr. DOLPH. Will the Senator from Michigan allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CONGER. Certainly.

Mr. DOLPH. I wish to ask the Senator from Michigan if he supposes that striking out the words "but such presumption may be rebutted" would at all change the sense of the proviso? I understand that it is only a prima facie presumption.

Mr. CONGER. Will the Senator read the first clause of the proviso?

Mr. DOLPH. It reads:

Provided, That all applicants for pensions shall be presumed to have had no disability at the time of enlistment.

I think the subsequent words, "but such presumption may be rebutted," are surplusage. It is not a conclusive presumption.

Mr. CONGER. Then the words ought to be stricken out, of course, if it means the same thing without them. I thank the Senator for his suggestion, and I think there is some force in it; but for fear that it might have a different construction from men who can not judge of the law and of the change of words as the Senator from Oregon can, the clause should be stricken out.

Mr. HARRISON. I simply want to make good a statement I made that the Senator from Michigan is asking more than the representatives of the soldiers before our Pension Committee themselves asked. He speaks with great eloquence of the men who went out and faced danger and death and slept under a covering of snow and endured hardships for the flag.

The gentlemen who signed the memorial from which I am about to read were men who had done and suffered all those things themselves. One of them at least was a man who had lost both his legs in the service of his country. All of them were influential members of that great body, the Grand Army of the Republic, and were in the habit of meeting from week to week in those social conferences in which the men who carried the flag to victory meet in every village and hamlet in the country. They were appointed by the national convention of that order to represent the wishes of the several hundred thousand soldiers who are now enrolled in the Grand Army of the Republic, as a special committee upon pension legislation. They came here and presented to our committee a memorial or address in which they asked for certain legislation. Among other things they said:

We are in favor of the bill which provides that the fact, as shown by the record of the acceptance and muster-in of the soldier and sailor, shall be received by the pension authorities as prima facie evidence that he was sound at that time—the Government not to be debarred from proving that he was unsound at date of enlistment, but the onus of the proof to be on the Government.

Mr. FRYE. Is not that exactly what the bill says?

Mr. HARRISON. It is exactly what the bill says as it stands now, but it will not be what the bill says if the amendment of the Senator from California prevails. The bill will then say that this presumption shall be conclusive. If a man was accepted and mustered in with one eye, the mustering officer believing that he had the physical capacity to render good service as a soldier, the Senator from Michigan would make this provision read that he shall be conclusively presumed to have had both eyes when he enlisted.

I only desired to show that this proposed legislation as it stands expresses the deliberate judgment of the great body of the soldiers of the country as to what they want, and that if a man who went into the service had lost a finger or an eye, or was suffering under some disability at the time of his acceptance into the service, comes back asking for a pension for the loss of an eye, the Government shall not absolutely be debarred from showing that he had lost it before he went into the service. The soldiers of this country are not asking for such legislation; at least they have not asked for it in any of the memorials or petitions which have been presented here.

Mr. MILLER, of California. The Senator from Indiana has read what the soldiers ask for, and it amounts to this: they ask that the burden of proof shall be on the Government of the United States and not upon the soldiers. I ask the Senator from Indiana as a lawyer whether the clause as it stands throws the burden of proof upon the Government? Does it require the Government to prove that the soldier was unsound at the time of his enlistment?

Mr. HARRISON. If I am able to understand language, it does. It says that "all applicants for pensions shall be presumed to have had no disability"—that is, to be sound "at the time of enlistment." The Senator as a lawyer knows that in the trial of a case, whether it be a presumption resulting from the proof of certain facts, or whether the law gives the defendant the prima facie evidence, the burden is cast upon the other party at once to disprove his case. So in this case, as I understand it, a soldier does not file with his application any evidence as to his status or as to his physical condition when he went into the service. He omits that. That evidence is prima facie furnished by the fact of his enlistment. But the Government may call witnesses to show that he had lost his eye or his thumb before he went into the service. If the amendment of the Senator from California should be adopted, that could not be done.

Mr. MILLER, of California. It amounts to saying that the soldier must go into a trial, and if the Government suggests that he was unsound at the time of enlistment, then there is a trial upon the question of fact, and the Government rebuts the presumption of soundness. But it is not required under this provision to offer conclusive proof that the disability existed before enlistment. That is the difference. It does not throw the burden of proof wholly upon the Government. The Government can put the soldier to his proof by a mere rebuttal. Any evidence tending to show that the disability existed before enlistment is rebutting evidence, and that puts the soldier upon his proof again, just as he is now. With these words stricken out, if the soldier commits a fraud the evidence of that fraud can be introduced. The presumption is not conclusive against fraud, but the pension is a contract between the Government and the soldier, and fraud vitiates everything.

Mr. HARRISON. I beg the Senator's pardon, if he will allow me to interrupt him. Suppose a case. Suppose a soldier in making application for a pension for the loss of an eye, as he alleges, which occurred in the battle of Spottsylvania. Under the bill as it stands it would be presumed that he had both eyes when he went into the service, but under the bill as it would stand if the Senator's amendment is adopted it would be conclusively proved against the Government that he had both eyes when he went into the service, and so far he would be helped in his application in making out his case that he lost his eye in battle that the Government or somebody would have to account for the loss of the eye after he went into the service, when the fact was he lost it before, because the presumption is that he had two eyes. The Senator says it would not apply to a case of fraud. There is no fraud about it. The soldier simply avails himself of the law, which says he had two eyes when he enlisted.

Mr. MILLER, of California. But the fraud I speak of is a fraud in enlistment. If a man presents himself for enlistment and knows he has a disability, some hidden defect which would unfit him for a soldier, and he is accepted and does not disclose that defect, of course that is a fraud upon the Government.

In the case put by the Senator from Indiana, where the party applying for a pension alleges that he lost an eye or a limb at some particular battle, and there is a presumption raised by the law that that is the fact, if you strike out these words the presumption is not so strong, it is not conclusive; the Government may introduce proof to show that such is not the fact, but that it is a false and fraudulent representation.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not so understand it. I understand that a conclusive presumption can not be rebutted; it can not be overcome. No proof will have any effect upon a conclusive presumption.

Mr. MILLER, of California. The presumption by this bill is not so conclusive as that. It is a presumption which requires proof to set it aside; that is all. What we contend for is to have the bill so that the burden of proof shall be upon the Government all the time in these cases, which the bill does not do in my opinion. The lawyers here differ. The Senator from Indiana says that this makes a conclusive presumption. The Senator from Oregon, who is an equally learned lawyer, says that it does not; that it is a mere prima facie case made out by the soldier; that striking out the clause does not affect the provision at all, as it is mere surplusage. I agree with the Senator from Oregon that if the words are surplusage they ought to be stricken out. There never ought to be surplusage in a law.

Mr. DOLPH. I do not understand that any presumption created by statute is conclusive unless it is so stated, and the addition of the words "but such presumption may be rebutted" does not change the effect of the proviso as it would stand if they were stricken out. The language is that "all applicants for pensions shall be presumed to have had no disability at the time of enlistment." The applicant makes a case as to soundness by the fact that he was examined when he was enlisted, but that may be overthrown by the Government, in my judgment, whether or not the words remain in the bill which the Senator from California has moved to strike out. As it was broadly stated that if these words were stricken out this would be a conclusive presumption, I desired to give my understanding of it before the question was voted upon.

Mr. HAWLEY. I hope the bill will not be left in such a shape as to permit anybody to say that the enlistment, the reception of a soldier, was conclusive evidence of his soundness. I think it would be so left if the last clause should be stricken out. It is proposed to strike out the words "but such presumption may be rebutted." The proviso would then read:

Provided, That all applicants for pensions shall be presumed to have had no disability at the time of enlistment.

It seems to me (I speak humbly as a lawyer of comparatively slight experience) that with that clause so reading it would still be the right and duty of the Government to show, in case of reasonable cause for doing so, that the soldier was unsound at the time of enlistment. It would be open to the Government to do that.

Mr. MILLER, of California. The burden of proof would be on the Government instead of on the soldier, as it is now.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not see that the retention of the clause would change the burden of proof at all.

Mr. MILLER, of California. It would change the law.

Mr. HAWLEY. In either case it rests upon the Government to show that the presumption the soldier has under the law is an unsound and unjust one; that it is not true. The burden of proof in the sense that my friend uses the term seems to have the same office in either case. It is possible, however, that it might be that striking out the clause "but such presumption may be rebutted" might change the judicial construction of this proposed act, and I should be sorry to have it do so.

I hope no amendment will be made, that no construction will be given here in debate that will make the presumption absolute, for I do know myself that there are cases where the presumption should not be absolute. I can see one of the men now in my mind's eye distinctly who would get a pension probably, and who would not in the slightest degree in the world deserve it. He could make a conclusive presumption. It is not one case alone. There are hundreds—yes, thousands—of cases toward the latter part of the war nearly entirely. When there came to be great bounties of three hundred, five hundred, six hundred, or a thousand dollars offered, and when the enlisting officers were very anxious to clear their county or their town of its quota under the draft, they gathered in whatever would come, men beyond age, men who obviously had physical unsoundness. They had not lost an eye or an arm, perhaps; there was no great visible disability; but the man I spoke of whom I had in my eye could not have gone on a double-quick for three hundred yards to save his life, and he looked as well as average men. He did not stay with our forces three weeks before he was sent back in contempt to the town from which he came as a disgrace to the law and the people who had sent him. That was more obvious than many other cases, but there were many of them toward the close, just as there were, unfortunately, of the miserable bounty-jumpers and deserters and thieves, many of whom were shot in the front of the line for attempts at desertion or other shameless crimes.

I object to the proposed amendment. I think the ex-soldiers of the Army would unanimously say that the Government ought clearly to have the right of rebuttal and ought to exercise it, for the pensioning of any such man—and it is generally known in his neighborhood, in his town, in his county—is a grievous offense and is felt as an insult. They desire to protect their own honor as well as the finances of the nation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from California [Mr. MILLER], upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FRYE (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON], who is detained from the Senate by sickness in his family. I shall not vote unless my vote may be necessary to make a quorum.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 17, nays 36; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] to strike out the proviso.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I made that motion intending to vote against it. I believe that the legislation as it appears in the bill as it came from the House of Representatives is wise and just and prudent. The Senate yesterday upon a point of order rejected an amendment that was offered by the Committee on Appropriations to this provision, upon the ground that it was general legislation upon an appropriation bill. The Committee on Appropriations reported amendments to strike out a large number of sections in this bill upon the ground that they were general legislation, and, therefore, properly not in the bill. They omitted to strike out the provisions of general legislation contained upon page 2, a part of which I have moved to eliminate for the purpose of ascertaining whether the rule about which we have been debating for the last week or two is to be enforced absolutely or only when it applies to legislation that the Senate desire to place upon an appropriation bill. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas, on which the yeas and nays have been demanded. Is there a second?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. As the case is stated by the Senator from Kansas, I shall vote against this provision; but there are other good reasons in my mind why I should vote for it. The Senate has passed two bills containing a provision which I regard as better than the one here proposed on this subject. Only on Saturday to the bill (H. R. 5800) for the relief of Sarah B. Jackson the Senate adopted an amendment which reads as follows:

SEC. —. That in all applications under the general pension laws, including this act, where it appears by record evidence that the applicant was regularly enlisted and mustered into the service, that fact shall be prima facie evidence of soundness at the time of his enlistment; but such presumption shall be subject to rebuttal by record or other competent evidence.

I regard this provision as much better than the one here proposed; and for the reasons which I have stated I am disposed to vote against this clause of the bill. If the House of Representatives desire to act upon this question they have two opportunities—one in the Mexican pension bill, so called, and the other in the bill to which I have just referred; and my information in regard to the latter bill is that there is a very strong probability that it will be agreed to. That bill also contains the provision in relation to increase of pension to widows and dependent parents, and it appears to me it is most likely it will be adopted by the House.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the amendment to be voted on be now read.

Mr. MITCHELL. I shall vote to strike out the clause, as I understand that is the form of the amendment proposed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Kansas is to strike out what will now be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the proviso at the end of section 1, beginning in line 29, as follows:

Provided, That all applicants for pension shall be presumed to have had no disability at the time of enlistment; but such presumption may be rebutted.

Mr. VOORHEES. I shall detain the Senate but a moment. The proviso does nothing when it allows presumption to be denied, because the presumption now is that a man was sound when he enlisted. Every applicant for pension in filing his application says he was a sound man when he enlisted, and that is the presumption now, and then the Government is permitted to turn around on him with all its force and destroy that presumption. That is just what it claims the right to do now, and it leaves him exactly where he is under the present law.

Mr. HARRISON. Will my colleague allow me to ask him whether he understands that under the present law all the proof a soldier is required to make that he was sound at the time of enlistment is his own affidavit?

Mr. VOORHEES. No, I do not; but shall I understand my colleague in that question to imply that a soldier who makes such a declaration has no presumption in his favor, or that he is presumed to not tell the truth?

Mr. HARRISON. No; nothing of the kind; but it is left as a fact to be proved, upon which the burden rests on him to supply what will be accepted as adequate proof, and under the law and the administration of it the soldier's affidavit of any particular fact, as for intance the fact of his having been shot in battle, is required to be supported by additional proof. So as it is now the burden of establishing the fact of soundness at the time of enlistment is upon him, and his affidavit is not accepted as sufficient proof on that or any other question; so that the legislation does help him.

Mr. VOORHEES. I just wish to call the attention of the Senate and the country to the fact that this matter is left where it is now, with perhaps the exception of the soldier, as the law stands now, being required to put in some additional proof besides his own declaration; but after he has made his declaration and his proof, the Government then has the right, as the law stands now and as it will stand after this measure is passed, to go to work and scour the country with its examiners, hunt up men who are the soldier's enemies in the neighborhood, and do everything toward him to break down his case as they can now. There is no question about that at all. This term "rebuttal" means nothing more than that the Government is at liberty to go to work and prove that it certified a falsehood when it certified that the man enlisted was sound.

If there is any value in this discussion at all it may be this, that when the Government accepted a man and certified that he was sound and qualified to be a soldier it shall be held to that record, that it shall not be permitted twenty years afterward to turn around and prove that it itself certified to a falsehood. That is the value of this. There is nothing more or less in it. When a soldier was inspected for service his lungs, his stomach, his limbs, his thews, his sinews, his heart, all his vital powers underwent medical inspection, and the authorities of the Government said, "This man is a sound man;" and I say the Government should be held to the same rule that would govern an honest man—that is, it should be estopped from going behind a record deliberately made and sending an officer to investigate the fact and say that what he said then was false.

I believe in no morals of that kind. When you say that the soldier shall be presumed to have been sound and then say that the Government may rebut the presumption, you just let the Government go to work with all its power of examiners and with money, as I have seen it going on for years past, to break down the soldier's case. I proclaim here as far as my feeble voice will extend that the soldier gains nothing by this proviso.

Mr. HARRISON. I supposed my colleague had had sufficient experience in his extended practice as a lawyer, too much experience, to make the statement which we have just heard from him, that it was no advantage to a litigant or claimant to have given to him at the outset a prima facie case. It will be new, I think, to the other lawyers in this body. "The burden of proof" is an expression well understood by every lawyer; he knows how much the difficulties of his case have been relieved when he can roll the burden of proof off upon his adversary and stand from under it himself; and yet I grieve to hear my colleague say that whereas now there is no presumption in favor of the soldier at all, but he is required to prove the fact of his soundness at the time of enlistment with precisely the same quality and the same amount of evidence that he is required to prove that he received a wound in action, it gives no relief, forsooth, when we start him in upon his proof without any burden as to the question of his soundness at the time of enlistment, but create a presumption in his favor without any proof whatever.

Mr. President, there are hundreds of cases that have been brought to my own attention, such as I alluded to a moment ago, where the soldier has removed from the place of his enlistment, where he has gone away from the friends who knew him before his enlistment, and where it is impossible for him to produce any testimony as to his physical condition before enlistment. Now, by this proviso in this bill that soldier is absolutely relieved of the necessity of producing any evidence at all on that point. He starts free. The burden is on the other side. The legal aspect of the case is, "My pension must be granted so far as the proof upon that question is concerned, unless the Government can prove that I was unsound at the time of my enlistment."

Mr. President, I was surprised to find that soldiers themselves know so little about these questions of pensions and the delays and impediment and restraints of the law which have been felt by them as personal matters, which have been discussed by them in those meetings where soldiers only act, in their camp-fires, in the Grand Army posts, in their national conventions of men who were in the field, men keenly alive to and in sympathy with their comrades who were disabled—that it never occurred to them, though they have discussed this matter for years, that to be relieved of the burden of proof and to be given a prima facie case was no relief. As I showed a moment ago, the intelligent representatives of the Grand Army of the Republic came to the Senate and said, "That is all we want; that relieves this difficulty, it removes the trouble;" and yet we are to be told here to-day that those gentlemen, as I said a while ago, one or more of them men who had been wounded in battle, are really ignorant of this question, and my colleague thinks that which they ask and all they ask will result in no benefit whatever to them.

Mr. President, I venture to say that those soldiers understood this question; they knew just where the difficulty was, and they made that reasonable demand which would remove the difficulty out of their way. I say no soldier has asked, by petition or otherwise, Congress to say that when a man was accepted, if he was found afterward with one eye, it should be conclusive presumption that he had two when he enlisted.

Mr. VOORHEES. Suppose the Government surgeon certified that he had two, then what would you do?

Mr. HARRISON. My colleague is unfamiliar with a mustering certificate. He is not familiar with the mustering certificates. The Government never did certify as to whether a man had one eye or two. They accepted him as a soldier, and that was all they certified; and it is within the knowledge of every man who was a soldier that sometimes during the stress of war and the demand for troops at the front men were accepted with but slight examination, and those men only ask that they may have a prima facie case.

I hope this proviso will not be stricken out, because it stands here as a response by the Senate of the United States to the demands of the Grand Army of the Republic, the organization of the veterans who went to the front and came back by God's grace alive if not whole—an exact response to the prayer which they have made in every particular. It starts every honest applicant for a pension upon his race of proof without any imputation against him, with the presumption that he was sound when he entered the service. It simply leaves it to be shown, if the fact was so, that in the particular case there was some existing unsoundness.

Mr. VOORHEES. But a single moment, Mr. President. The question which it seems my colleague either will not or can not discern in this matter is, whether the Government shall be allowed to dispute its own solemn record in order to evade the duty of paying a pension. That is not a question of presumption. I vote to retain this proviso for what it is worth. It would be worth everything to the soldier if it were not for the last clause of it. I am willing to go to the country and to any honest tribunal on the question whether the United States Government, after certifying to a fact, shall be allowed to turn around and say it did not tell the truth. I am willing to stand on that. That is the question here. I say the Government, after it certified that a man was qualified to be a soldier, should not be allowed to dispute it in order to defeat the payment of a pension.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana what will be the effect if the amendment prevails and the proviso is stricken out?

Mr. HARRISON. The soldier is left without any prima facie case; he is left as now to make his proof as he can.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 44; as follows:

YEAS—16.

Bayard,	Camden,	Harris,	Mitchell,
Beck,	Coke,	Hoar,	Pike,
Brown,	Garland,	Jackson,	Platt,
Butler,	Hampton,	Maxey,	Vance.

Colquitt,	Farley,	Kenna,	Riddleberger,

Edmunds,	Groome,	Logan,	Walker.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania] is called away by illness. I presume he would vote "nay" if he were present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still open to amendment.

Mr. LAPHAM. At the end of line 33, section 1, I move to add:

By record evidence or other competent evidence on behalf of the United States.

So as to read:

But such presumption may be rebutted by record evidence or other competent evidence on behalf of the United States.

Mr. BAYARD. Is that in order?

Mr. LAPHAM. This amendment makes the bill correspond with the one the Senate has already passed and sent to the House; that is, it defines the mode of proof by which the presumption may be rebutted.

Mr. PLATT. I am not aware that the amendment has been received. Does not a point of order lie against the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will dispose of any question of order which may be raised upon it when raised.

Mr. PLATT. I was not aware that the amendment had been received so that it was before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the duty of the Chair to receive any amendment that may be proposed. If any Senator chooses to make a question of order upon the amendment, the Chair will dispose of the question of order when raised.

Mr. PLATT. If it is not too late, I raise the question——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not too late.

Mr. PLATT. I raise the question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not hesitate to sustain the point of order. The amendment is legislation and is not in order.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the next special order upon the Calendar of Special Orders, being, as the Chair is advised, the bill (H. R. 3933) to declare a forfeiture of lands granted to the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, and for other purposes.

Mr. DOLPH. I now move to take up for consideration Order of Business 1001, being the bill (H. R. 7004) to repeal all laws providing for the pre-emption of the public lands and the laws allowing entries for timber culture.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that under the order of the Chair a moment since the wrong bill was announced. The Chair ordered that the first bill on the Calendar of Special Orders be reported to the Senate. The Secretary will now report the bill which is the first of the special orders.

The CHIEF CLERK. A joint resolution (S. R. 18) proposing an amendment to article 1, section 7, clause 2, of the Constitution of the United States, in relation to the veto power.

Mr. DOLPH. I now renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7004) to repeal all laws providing for the pre-emption of the public lands, and the laws allowing entries for timber culture.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would suggest to the Senator from Oregon that he must first dispose of the joint resolution before the Senate by postponing the consideration of the same or other disposition, before his motion will be in order.

Mr. DOLPH. I move then that the joint resolution before the Senate be postponed until Saturday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon moves that the further consideration of the joint resolution now before the Senate be postponed until Saturday next.

Mr. INGALLS. By whom was that resolution reported?

Mr. CULLOM. I hope that resolution will be passed over informally. It is a joint resolution introduced by my colleague.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution was reported by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN].

Mr. CULLOM. I ask that it be passed over informally, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois asks that the joint resolution be informally laid aside, holding its place as the first special order upon the Calendar. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. DOLPH. Now I renew my motion to proceed to the consideration of House bill 7004.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks it is the duty of the Chair to lay the next special order upon the Calendar of Special Orders before the Senate. The Secretary will state it.

Mr. DOLPH. I move that that be laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The title of the bill will first be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 1652) to provide for the improvement of the channel between Galveston Harbor and the Gulf of Mexico.

Mr. COKE. I ask that that bill may be informally laid aside, retaining its place as a special order on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas asks that the bill just announced be informally laid aside, holding its place on the Calendar of Special Orders. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. DOLPH. Now I move that the next special order be laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the next special order on the Calendar of special orders.

Mr. DOLPH. I move that the Calendar be laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the special order by its title, and then the Senator can be heard.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 60) to declare certain lands subject to taxation.

Mr. DOLPH. I move that the Calendar be laid aside for the purpose of considering House bill 7004. I move that it be taken up for present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair holds that the Senator's motion is not in order.

Mr. DOLPH. That the Calendar be laid aside?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That the Calendar be laid aside. The Senator may move to postpone to a day certain or indefinitely the special order, and that disposes of all special orders, and the motion he has suggested, the Chair thinks, would then be in order.

Mr. DOLPH. Very well, Mr. President, I accommodate myself to the ruling. I move that the special order be laid aside for the present for the consideration of House bill 7004.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He can move to postpone to a day certain, if the Senator desires to conform to the rule.

Mr. DOLPH. I move to postpone it until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon moves that the pending bill be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. GARLAND. The bill now called as the special order is a bill which I reported from the Judiciary Committee; but the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] who is absent from his seat introduced the bill originally, and manifested more concern in it than anybody else. I would supplement the motion by moving that it be postponed until Saturday next, because it will be impossible to consider it to-morrow on account of the counting of the electoral vote at the other end of the Capitol.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas moves that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until Saturday next.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC LAND LAWS.

Mr. DOLPH. I understand, Mr. President, that that was an amendment to the motion made by me. I now move to take up House bill 7004.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The title of the bill designated by the Senator from Oregon will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (H. R. 7004) to repeal all laws providing for the pre-emption of the public lands and the laws allowing entries for timber culture.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of this bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the consideration of the bill was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the bill has been read, and all the amendments recommended by the Committee on Public Lands agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH. I think not; the last two amendments have not been acted on yet.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary has just corrected his former statement, and informs the Chair that some of the committee amendments have not yet been acted on. The first of the amendments not heretofore acted on will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Committee on Public Lands propose to insert, as a new section, the following:

SEC. 5. That after the passage of this act no public lands of the United States, except abandoned military or other reservations and mineral and other lands the sale of which at public auction has been authorized by acts of Congress of a special nature having local application, shall be sold at public auction or be subject to private entry; and all offered public lands are hereby withdrawn from market, and shall be disposed of as unoffered public lands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To this amendment of the committee the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] offered an amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposed amendment to the amendment is, at the end of line 8, to insert:

Excepting all lands situate in the State of Missouri.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri to the amendment of the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DOLPH. I hope that if this course is to be followed by Senators from other States where there are offered public lands, the amendment will be voted down and the section offered as an amendment by the committee be voted down also rather than undertake to except the several States where there are offered public lands.

As I stated on a former occasion, there are but few States where there are offered public lands for sale at private entry. Those are Missouri, Arkansas, Mississippi, Louisiana, Alabama, Florida, Michigan, and Minnesota. There are also small amounts of such lands in California,

Oregon, and Washington Territory, and the Territory of New Mexico. If the Senators from the Southern States, where there are considerable quantities of offered lands, are not in favor of this provision withdrawing those lands from private entry, it will be better to vote down this section offered by the committee and then strike out of the bill section 6, as it came from the House, than to undertake to except the several States in this section. I do not see the Senator from Missouri, who offered the amendment.

Mr. VEST. My colleague is not present, but I can state the reasons which I think will be entirely satisfactory to the Senate why this provision should not apply to the State of Missouri. There are no public lands in the State of Missouri that will ever be taken up by homesteads or pre-emptions. The only lands within the limits of that State which are now public lands are mineral lands, lands situated in the hilly or mountainous portions of the State, and they are not taken up by homesteaders. If this section applies to the State of Missouri, it simply amounts to keeping those lands that are now public lands in their present condition forever. All we desire as representing that State is that this provision shall not apply to Missouri in order that these lands may be entered for grazing and mineral purposes, as they certainly will not be taken up by homesteads or pre-emptions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 20, noes 15; no quorum voting.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now let the amendment that I offered be read again, that I may see exactly the relation of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri will be read again.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment and the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask what action has been taken upon section 4.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Section 4 has been agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. And then section 5, the new section?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the pending section, to which the Senator's amendment is proposed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon if this proposed amendment, section 5, the new section, was disagreed to, what would be the condition then of the bill?

Mr. DOLPH. If the motion to strike out section 6 and insert section 5, which is under consideration, should not prevail, the bill would stand as it came from the House, with section 6 in it, and then a motion could be made to strike out section 6. If section 5 is not adopted and section 6 should be stricken out, it would leave all the offered lands, lands subject to private entry, in the States named, still subject to private entry.

My objection to the amendment of this section by excepting a State is that it is likely to be followed by like amendments excepting other States where there are offered lands. If that is to be the case the section had better be voted down at once, but if there are no other Senators who desire to except their States from the operation of this section I should have no serious objection to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no disposition to complicate this bill in any shape, manner, or form, for I am heartily in favor of the general provisions of it, but it would do great injustice to the State of Missouri and to her people for this section 5 to be adopted. I offered the amendment which I did for the purpose of excepting Missouri from the operation of the law. I see at once that if an exception be made in favor of one State there will be exceptions then sought in favor of others, and the better way and the proper way would be to disagree to section 5, the amendment proposed by the committee, and then agree to strike out section 6. I ask the Senator if that would not leave the public lands in these old States just in the condition they are now in?

Mr. DOLPH. So far as the question of their sale at private entry is concerned, it would.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is what I mean. I have in my hand a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, which I will read:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 5, 1885.

SIR: In response to your verbal request of to-day, I have the honor to state that it is probable that all public lands in the State of Missouri, now vacant, have once been offered at public sale. There were withdrawals made for the following railroads: Hannibal and Saint Jo, lands within the six and fifteen miles limits; Saint Louis and San Francisco, from Saint Louis to Springfield, six and fifteen miles, and from Springfield west, for Atlantic and Pacific, twenty and thirty miles limits; the Iron Mountain, from Bird's Point southwest to State line, six, fifteen, and twenty miles, and from Ironton to Poplar Bluff, ten and twenty miles limits.

The alternate sections, which were increased in price by reason of being within the granted limits of the above roads, were offered at $2.50 per acre, but such as were reduced in price by act of June 15, 1880 (21 Stat., 236), have not been reoffered at such reduced price, and they are not subject to private entry until so reoffered. The sections within the indemnity limits, which did not inure to the benefit of the railroads, were restored to market at private entry.

There is probably a large amount of land in Missouri that has been withdrawn from sale at private entry by having been entered under the homestead laws, which entries were subsequently canceled. Such lands are not subject to private entry unless they shall have been properly restored.

Very respectfully,

L. HARRISON,
Assistant Commissioner.

Hon. F. M. COCKRELL,
United States Senate.

I desire to say simply that on the north side of the Missouri River, in our State, there are no public lands. All the public lands in Missouri are south of the Pacific Railroad substantially, and the greater part of them in the southern part of the State. There are no prairie lands, there are no agricultural lands in Missouri to-day vacant; no lands whatever that can be called agricultural lands. There can not be found one hundred and sixty acres of public land in Missouri upon which you could make a tillable field of sixty acres. There is land some of which has timber upon it; some of it has brush; it probably will be valuable for grazing cattle and sheep; and it will be valuable to some extent for the timber.

If you make this land subject to homesteads you simply preclude the sale of another acre of land in Missouri. There it is. It has been for twenty-five years subject to private entry; nobody has taken it up, speculators have not gone there and taken it up, and there is no danger of anything of that kind. Now, Mr. President, I shall insist that the Senate disagree to this proposed amendment known as section 5, and let the Missouri lands remain precisely as they have been so far as the provision at private sale is concerned. I hope that the Senate will do this. It does not affect any other lands which are properly tillable, agricultural lands.

If I may be allowed I would move—the motion, I believe, would not be in order, however—that the Senate disagree to the proposed amendment of the committee. If the Senate will permit, I will withdraw the amendment which I proposed, making a special exception of Missouri, and ask the Senate to non-concur in this amendment of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HALE in the chair). The yeas and nays have been ordered on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Missouri that he can offer his amendment in the Senate; that he withdraw it at this time, and let the vote be had in Committee of the Whole on the section as it stands. If it should be voted down of course the matter will be ended; but if the Senate adopts the amendment of the committee it will be open in the Senate to amendment still, and then the amendment excepting Missouri can be offered.

Mr. COCKRELL. That was precisely what I was stating, that I would withdraw the amendment which I had proposed and ask the Senate to vote down section 5.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri desire to withdraw his amendment?

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to withdraw my amendment, or that the order of the Senate ordering the yeas and nays may be reconsidered, and then that I may be allowed to withdraw the amendment in order that we may take a direct vote on the amendment of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the order of the Senate ordering the yeas and nays on his amendment be vacated. If there be no objection it is so ordered. The Senator from Missouri now asks leave to withdraw his amendment. There being no objection it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLPH. Before the vote is taken on the amendment reported by the committee I desire to call attention again to the States in which the lands subject to private entry are situated. There are in the State of Mississippi about 1,000,000 acres; in Florida about 500,000 acres; in each of the States of Alabama, Arkansas, and Louisiana about 200,000; in the northern portions of Michigan and Minnesota about 500,000 acres each. There are only about 50,000 acres in California, 50,000 acres in Oregon, and 50,000 acres in Washington Territory. These amounts are not large enough to make the matter of any considerable importance to the people of the Pacific coast. I understand that portions of the lands subject to private entry in some of the States, if not in Missouri, are agricultural lands. I simply want the Senate to understand what they are voting upon, where the lands are situated, and what the character of the land is, before they vote on the committee amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator if all the lands thus situated have not been open to private entry for more than twenty years?

Mr. DOLPH. I think probably for more than twenty-five years and continuously, except in the Southern States, where during or just after the war they were withdrawn from private entry for a time, and then again placed on the market subject to private entry by act of Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then it seems to me there would be no harm in letting the thing stand as it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee proposed as section 5.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Oregon if the effect of this section 5, when passed, is not to prevent any entry of the public lands except a homestead entry?

Mr. DOLPH. Did I understand the Senator from Florida to propose a question to me?

Mr. CALL. I asked the Senator from Oregon if the effect of this section 5, if passed, is not to prevent any entry on the public lands except a homestead entry.

Mr. DOLPH. Certainly not. The section under consideration, if adopted, would only withdraw lands from private entry. Unless we pass the bill itself and adopt the sections which repeal the pre-emption law the land can still be entered under that law. Unless we adopt the section which repeals the timber-culture act they can still be entered under that act, and so with the desert-land act.

Mr. DOLPH. Offered public lands are such lands as have been offered at public sale, and not having been sold at public sale are afterward subject to private entry. That would be the only class of land which would be affected by this section.

Mr. CALL. Unoffered public lands are only subject to pre-emption entry.

Mr. DOLPH. Under the homestead law, the timber-culture act, and the desert-land act they are open to settlement.

Mr. CALL. I am speaking of section 5. The section says:

SEC. 5. That after the passage of this act no public lands of the United States, except abandoned military or other reservations and mineral and other lands the sale of which at public auction has been authorized by acts of Congress of a special nature having local application, shall be sold at public auction or be subject to private entry; and all offered public lands are hereby withdrawn from market, and shall be disposed of as unoffered public lands.

Mr. DOLPH. But the Senator will understand that the terms "offered lands" and "private entry" have come to have a special meaning when applied to the land laws.

Mr. CALL. I so understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Public Lands proposed as section 5.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DOLPH. There is still another committee amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The committee report to strike out section 6, as follows:

SEC. 6. That after the passage of this act no public lands of the United States adapted to agriculture shall be sold except mineral lands and town sites; and all of the public lands of the United States adapted to agriculture shall be reserved for actual and bona fide settlers only, under the provisions of the homestead law, subject, however, to bounty-land warrants and college scrip issued by authority of Congress, and the grants which Congress has made and shall hereafter make in the new States and Territories for the purpose of education; but all laws and parts of laws touching the rights of the officers, soldiers, and seamen heretofore in the military or naval service of the United States in the public lands are continued in full force: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to amend or repeal the act for the sale of timber lands in the States of California, Oregon, Nevada, and in Washington Territory, passed June 3, 1878: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to impair, defeat, or in any manner affect the rights of any State to indemnity for swamp and overflowed lands granted to the State of Arkansas and other States under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to enable the State of Arkansas and other States to reclaim the swamp lands within their limits," approved September 28, 1850, as provided in sections 2479, 2480, 2481, 2482, 2483, 2484, 2485, 2486, 2487, 2488, 2489, and 2490 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. DOLPH. I think the previous section has been inadvertently acted on. The motion was to strike out and insert, and it failed, and there has been no motion renewed to strike out. I understand it will not be in order until the committee amendments are disposed of; and on page 7 is another committee amendment which I suppose will be in order to be acted upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No action of the Senate has been taken on the amendment which has just been read.

Mr. COCKRELL. As I understand, really section 5 was a substitute for section 6, but the proposed amendment came in in advance of what was proposed to be stricken out. We have disagreed to section 5 to be inserted, and now I hope we shall agree to striking out section 6, and that leaves us all right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment striking out section 6.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is only a question of the order in which it was printed. Section 5 comes in in advance of section 6, and it is an independent proposition, though practically it was intended to strike out section 6 and insert the proposed section 5 in lieu of it. Now, I hope the amendment of the committee proposing to strike out section 6 will be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to strike out section 6.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 6. That section 2288 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 2288. Any person who has already settled on the public lands, either by pre-emption or by virtue of the homestead law, or any amendments thereto, and any person who shall hereafter settle on the public lands by virtue of the homestead law, or any amendments thereto, shall have the right to transfer, by warranty against his own acts, any portion of his pre-emption or homestead for church, cemetery, or school purposes, or for the right of way of railroads across such pre-emption or homestead; and the transfer for such public purposes shall in no way vitiate the right to complete and perfect the title to their pre-emptions or homesteads."

Mr. DOLPH. This is an exact copy of the old statute, except that it eliminates the words "pre-emption law" where they occur in this section so as to make it conform with the bill, if it is passed, which repeals the pre-emption law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. Are there further amendments from the committee?

Mr. DOLPH. There is an amendment I should like to offer in section 1, in lines 9, 10, and 11, to strike out the words "and all other laws allowing pre-emption of the public lands in the United States."

I have ascertained since the bill was reported that there are some special acts authorizing the pre-emption of lands on Indian reservations or lands ceded to the United States by Indian tribes, which can only be disposed of in that manner. I have ascertained further that since the statutes were revised there have been no amendments of importance to the pre-emption law, and therefore the words "and all other laws allowing pre-emption of the public lands of the United States" may be stricken out without doing any harm, and striking them out will leave in force the laws covering these exceptional cases which we might overlook if we undertook to specify them all in the act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 9, after the words "United States," it is proposed to strike out:

And all other laws allowing pre-emption of the public lands of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH. I move further to amend the bill by adding after the word "repealed," in line 29 of section 1, the following proviso:

And provided further, That all entries heretofore made under the pre-emption laws on which final proof and payment have been made and to which there are no adverse claims and which have been sold to innocent purchasers, shall be confirmed and patented upon presentation of satisfactory proof to the proper Department officer of such sale.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me that is a wide-reaching provision, which may confirm illegal entries, irregular entries, entries that are in violation of law. The Senator, I suppose, does not intend that.

Mr. DOLPH. I will state what is proposed. This amendment was submitted to me by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN], and I was requested to offer it. It has been submitted, I believe, to all the members of the Committee on Public Lands who are present and accessible and has been approved by all of them. It only proposes the confirmation of titles where final proof has been made, where payment has been made, and where the land has passed into the hands of innocent purchasers, and where the Commissioner of the General Land Office or the Secretary of the Interior shall be satisfied from the proof that the purchasers are innocent purchasers. Under the laws regulating the transfer of property between private citizens, a purchaser of property in good faith and for a valuable consideration from a person having evidence of title would be entitled to hold it, as against a third person who might be the real equitable owner of it. It is only proposed to apply the same rule to the Government where there are no adverse claims to the property; and where, as I have said, the land has been entered, final proof and payment made before the transfer, I see no objection to it myself. And, as I said before, I understand from the Senator from Minnesota that it has been submitted to each member of the Committee on Public Lands and no objection made to it. That was the reason I offered it.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me this is a wide-reaching provision. This would confirm absolutely void pre-emption claims. It would prevent the United States from setting up its title merely because some person alleged to be an innocent holder might claim the land. These pre-emptions may have been made on lands not subject to pre-emption. The proof might have been made. I trust the Senator will not press it. I am not sufficiently informed about the nature of pre-emptions. I hope, therefore, it will not be offered here unless it is reported from the committee, and I do not think then it ought to be reported except upon a letter from the Commissioner of the Land Office or the Secretary of the Interior. Certainly this would confirm we do not know how many claims. In ordinary cases, when the pre-emptor has paid the purchase-money and the matter seems to be all clear, he would get his title as a matter of course. Consequently this is intended to confirm illegal pre-emptions, fraudulent pre-emptions, pre-emptions on land that is not open to pre-emption, and denies to the United States the power to resist those pre-emptions and the execution of patents based upon them, simply, forsooth, because somebody who is innocent of the fraud is, may be, now in possession. That would be wrong. The United States might be in great danger from such a wide-reaching provision, and therefore it ought not to be adopted, it seems to me, except upon full consideration.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Minnesota exhibited this amendment to me yesterday. Without fully getting its scope, perhaps I may have said I did not see any objection to it. But the general subject has been before the Committee on Public Lands in the shape of a bill introduced by the Senator from Colorado, and the committee encountered a great deal of difficulty in the consideration of it. Undoubtedly there are a great many claims which ought to be passed and patented which have been prevented, but on the other hand there are a great many claims which have been suspended which ought not to be passed. That is the prima facie condition at least.

A provision of this kind, so sweeping in its nature, would in my judgment be really against the interests of the Government and against the interests of justice as between claimants; but with reference generally to the disposition of the public lands the bill which the Senator from Colorado introduced and the committee have under consideration, provided that after a certain lapse of time, after the issue of a patent, proceedings might be taken to set aside the patent, and that brought up the general question of holding up claims in the General Land Office on the ground that the pre-emption law or the homestead law or whatever law they were sought to be entered under, had not been complied with.

I have no doubt that in a great many cases the reports of special agents or other reports on which the Interior Department has acted have been partial and have worked injustice; but on the other hand every one who reads the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and who is at all conversant with the history of the administration of the public land laws during the last few years, must know that in the greed to get land which has seized upon a good many people during the last few years a great many instances have occurred where entries have been made which were not warranted by the law at all and which were practically a fraud on the Government.

If the Government were desirous simply of getting the money for the lands, if it was only a question of getting a dollar and a quarter an acre, then of course the Government side of the question might well be satisfied by the money; but for many years the public lands have been regarded as a trust for the benefit of those persons, citizens of the United States who desired to make homes on them and therefore the mere payment of money unaccompanied by the evidences of settlement which the law requires and unaccompanied by the fact that men have actually made homes to entitle them to enter them is practically a fraud upon the public. It is that class of cases which this bill is designed to prevent.

While a healing act in reference to certain classes of those cases might be well, at the same time it can not be framed off-hand. It is not wise, as I think, to put it onto a bill of this kind, or of any kind, without some discussion of the matter so that the exact limitations of it may be thoroughly understood. It might be possible that you could heal all entries made in a certain number of years. That would do in certain sections of the country; but in certain others perhaps that would not do. Therefore, this being a very large question, it seems to me to be unwise to attempt in this manner to ingraft it upon legislation.

Mr. VEST. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the Senator from Missouri to withdraw that for a moment.

Mr. VEST. We can not finish this bill to-night because there are important amendments here. It is impossible to finish it.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the Senator from Missouri to withdraw the motion until I can make a report from a conference committee.

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is withdrawn.

SUITS FOR DAMAGES.

Mr. HARRIS. I offered this morning the report of a committee of conference, but on hearing it read at the desk I discovered that the clerk of the House committee in making the duplicate copy had omitted a single word, and I sent it back to have the House conferees and Senate conferees agree to insert the word. I now present the report in correct form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee submits a report from a conference committee, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House No. 7131, to authorize suits for damages where death results from the wrongful act, neglect, or default of any person or corporation in the District of Columbia, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with the following amendments thereto:

In the first section of said Senate amendment and next before the proviso to said section insert the following words: "And such damages shall be assessed with reference to the injury resulting from such act, neglect, or default causing such death, to the widow and next of kin of such deceased person."

And also by adding to said first section, after the proviso, the following words: "And provided further, That no action shall be maintained under this act in any case where the party injured by such wrongful act, neglect, or default has recovered damages therefor during the life of such party."

And also by amending the said Senate amendment by striking out of said second section thereof the words "two years" and inserting in lieu thereof "one year."

And the Senate agree to the said amendments to the Senate amendments to said bill.

ISHAM G. HARRIS,
JOHN J. INGALLS,
H. H. RIDDLEBERGER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

LUKE P. POLAND,
J. R. TUCKER,
WILLIAM DORSHEIMER,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT AUGUSTA, ME.

Mr. FRYE. I ask unanimous consent that the question of concurrence in the House amendment to the bill providing for the erection of a public building in the city of Augusta, Me., may be passed upon now. It is a Senate bill, has passed the Senate twice, and is returned from the House with an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HALE in the chair). The Chair lays before the Senate a bill returned from the House of Representatives.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Resolved, That the bill from the Senate, No. 235, entitled "An act to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Augusta, Me.," do pass with the following amendment:

In line 11 of the bill, after the word "dollars," insert the following:

"And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, after the site for said building shall have been purchased, to cause a plan and specifications of said building to be prepared, which plan and specifications shall not involve an expenditure, in the erection and completion of said building and the approaches thereto, exceeding the portion of said $150,000 remaining after the site of said building shall have been paid for; and no plan for said building shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury involving an expenditure exceeding the sum so remaining after paying for the site of said building."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 10, 1885.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, February 7, was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Journal as read will be approved.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask that the Journal as read be amended in that portion of the proceedings of yesterday which refers to what occurred between one of the assistant sergeants-at-arms of the House and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE].

After stating that the Sergeant-at-Arms returned for his mace and passed up the aisle, it says "the gentleman from Kentucky took his seat." That is a mistake, and it should state the truth, which is that when the member from Kentucky saw the party who had assailed him pass beside the Speaker's chair and assume the mace he took his seat; so that the Journal should read "he had taken his seat," and not that he took his seat under the constraint of the Sergeant-at-Arms with the mace in his hand.

This much is due to the gentleman from Kentucky. I can have no personal feeling in suggesting this amendment which is due to him. The House knows that there can have been no personal relations between him and me for some years past, while I know I am ready to bear testimony that I have never experienced anything but courtesy from the gentleman, whom I think was yesterday a grave aggressor upon the dignity and decorum of the House.

I move that the Journal be amended by striking out the word "took" and inserting "had taken," or such form of words as may be necessary to make the correction I have suggested.

Mr. COX, of New York. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that this matter should be correct in the Journal, and I am equally sure that it is correct as it now stands. It is a mistake on the part of the gentlemen on the other side of the House, perhaps on this side, that the mace, Cromwell's old bauble, is the only symbol of authority. It is only the outward emblem of the inward authority of the Speaker; and when the Speaker sent the Sergeant-at-Arms, without having the mace in his possession, down to the member from Kentucky, he had the right under the fourth paragraph of Rule XIV to do just what he did; and I wish that rule had been read in the hearing of the House on yesterday, as it might have saved the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. That clause of the rule in question is as follows:

> 4. If any member, in speaking or otherwise, transgress the rules of the House, the Speaker shall, or any member may, call him to order; in which case he shall immediately sit down.
